"He did, too! He kissed me and Mary Hopper and Sue White and I seen him trying to catch Miss Horton, but she dodged, and he—"

"Well, what do you know about that? The trifler to—"

"But ain't that what the mistletoe is there for?"

"Yes, but they ain't no use of a man makin' a hog of himself just because girls like Amy Briggs don't have no more womanly modesty than t' put themselves in their way all th' time. That new Mr. Morehouse didn't like it, either. I could tell he was ashamed of Amy, the way he acted. He's coming up to call this afternoon. I'll fix Henry for— Mercy, there he is now and— Well, what do you think of that? Amy Briggs is with him!"

"You see," said Mr. Morehouse, looking fondly at Miss Briggs, as they were about to depart, "Amy and I used to be warm fr—er, that is we were engaged once, and had a quarrel—you know. I didn't expect to meet her at the party and she didn't know she was standing right under the mistletoe waiting for me."

"The idea!" scoffed Mame, when the door closed upon them.

"Didn't know she was under the mistletoe!" echoed Sally, scornfully. "Ain't men the easiest, though?"

Same Here.

Oh, have you strutted down the street, all dressed up in your best—a long-tailed coat, a stovepipe hat, a silken fancy vest—to find when by a glass you go, your heart is pained and sore from learning that the hat you wear is on wrong-side-before? So have I!

Oh, have you dressed up fit to kill and called upon a maid whose heart you seek to subtly win by calling Cupid's aid, to learn, alas! when 'tis too late and made up is her mind, you might have won her but for this: Your necktie's up behind? So have I!

Oh, have you tried to get a ten by borrowing from friends and learned that every one has joined the New Year's "Never Lends?" And have you eaten lunch at noon where beer is five a glass? Oh, well, of course if you refuse, we'll let this question pass. So have I! Let it pass, I mean.

Oh, have you told your darling wife, when crawling into bed, that business kept you very late—and covered up your head—to find next morning when you woke, a world of woe and care, because the sweetheart of your life has found an auburn hair? So have I!

Oh, have you tried to write a piece to make a nation laugh—a ticklish nothing as it were, chock full of joy and chaff—to find when all is written rot and it is cold in type that you have picked a lemon that is very far from ripe? So have I!

Poor Setter Dog.

A Battle Creek (Mich.) man had a setter dog upon which his heart was set. The dog set on the electric line and the motorman failed to set the brake soon enough, with the result that the car settled the setter. The company refused to settle for the loss of the setter, whereupon the owner set the law on it and recovered $100 and costs, which the company settled for the dear little setter. The man better setter again.

Married Man Fixed.

A citizen was overhead to make an ungallant remark on the street the other day. He said his neighbor was speaking to him about the heavy expense connected with keeping a family, and asked: "Don't you find it so?" "No, I use my wife's temper for a furnace, her feet for a refrigerator, her company manners for sugar, and then we have tongue all the year round, so you see my expenses are very light."

THROUGH VAST SEA OF GOLDEN GRAIN

Graphic Description in Outing of a Canadian Wheat Field.

Take a look at the wheat field that has been brought up to perfection as it stands. Yellow as gold, with the sheen of the sea, billowing from sky line to sky line like an ocean of gold, where the wind touches the rippling wave crests with the tread of invisible feet. In California, in Oregon, in Washington, in Dakota, in the Canadian Northwest, you may ride all day on horseback through the wheat fields without a break in the flow of yellow, heavy-headed grain, says a writer in The Outing Magazine. No fence line No meadow lands. No shade trees. No knobs and knolls and hills and hollows of grass or black earth through. From dawn till dark, from sunrise in a burst of fiery splendor over the prairie horizon to sundown when the crimson thing hangs like a huge shield of blood in the haze of a heat twilight—you may ride with naught to break the view between you and the horizon but wheat—wheat.

It is like the gold fields. It goes to your head. You grow dizzy looking at it. You rub your eye. Is it a mirage? The billowy yellow waves seem to be breasting every sky. You look up. The sky is there all right with the black mote of a meadow lark sailing the azure sea. He drops liquid notes of sheer mellow music down on your head, does that meadow lark; and that gives you back your perspective, your senses of amazing reality. You are literally, absolutely in the midst of a sea of living gold. It is you and not the lark that is the mote. You begin to feel as if your special mote might might be a beam that would get lost in infinity if you stayed there long; and so you ride on—and on—and some more on—and by and by you come out of the leaguelong, fenceless fields with an odor in your nostrils that isn't exactly incense—it's too fugitive, to fine, too sublimal of earth. It is aromatic, a sort of attar of roses, the imprisoned fragrance of the billion upon billions of wheat flowers shut up in the gimmes of the heavy-headed grain there. And that's the odor of the wheat.

Tuberculosis Campaign of Great Progress.

With the opening of the new year, the campaign against tuberculosis in the United States exhibits the most remarkable progress that any movement for social betterment has ever shown in this country. During the past year, the amount of activity and the number of the people who have been reached by this activity has been far in excess of similar work that has been carried on during the four years previous.

Measured by dollars, the campaign against tuberculosis in the United States during the year 1908, has cost well over a million. Measured in the number of workers, the campaign has enlisted hundreds of thousands in its ranks. Measured by the number of institutions and organizations that have been established during the year 1908, more work of this sort has been accomplished than during the entire period before January 1 of the year just closing. For instance, before January 1, 1905, there were only 19 dispensaries in the United States providing special treatment for tuberculous cases. Up to the year 1908, this number had increased to slightly over 100. During the year 1908 alone, over 100 dispensaries providing special treatment for tuberculous patients have been opened. The number of tuberculous sanatoria and hospitals opened in the year 1908 is more than 80, a figure which is four times that of the amount of progress shown in this line in any other year before 1908. The number of associations having for their object the study or prevention of consumption, established during the year 1908, totals up to 120, which figure again is more than the entire number which had previously been established in the United States.

But not only in the number of institutions but also in the variety of people interested and in the increase in workers, can the progress of the anti-tuberculosis campaign be measured. Never before in the history of the United States have so many movements co-operated and allied to fight the common foe, the white plague. Never in any single year have so many ranks of people been stirred to activity in a movement for the betterment of the condition of man, as during the year 1908. For instance, durin the past year from one end of the country to the other, the labor unions and working men have been started to a realization of the fact that consumption is a disease which affects them, and they have been arming from east to west for the fight against the common foe. Hand in hand, the movement of the labor unions has been the stimulus given to the clergymen and the churches throughout the country. Never before have so many sermons on tuberculosis been preached from the pulpits of the various churches of the country. The schools, too, have been arousboth through special institutions for the treatment of tuberculous children and by means of special instructions to the children in the regular grades in the schools. Hundreds of children have been instructed on the dangers of tuberculosis. State legislatures, government officials, business concerns, factory owners, social workers, men and women of all sorts of classes have during this past year been aroused to renewed interest in the campaign against consumption.

Of the influences which have contributed to produce this result, probably the most weighty, has been the international Congress on Tuberculosis which as held in Washington during the latter part of September and the first of October, attracting as it did the attention of men and women in every State in the Union. Representatives were present from almost every section of the country, and the benefit derived from this inspiring gathering has doubtless given the greatest impetus to activity in the fight against consumption that this country has ever experienced. The National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis by means of constant propaganda and its two traveling exhibits, has also helped to contribute to the campaign. Particularly is this so in regard to the South. The Red Cross Stamp Campaign, with its 25,000,000 stamps, has been one of the greatest mediums of education on tuberculosis as well as a means of raising money that has ever been used in this country.

The managers of the campaign against tuberculosis are realizing that they have a hard fight ahead of them, and every means that will bring home to the ignorant the gospel of health is being employed. It is safe to predict that with the present rate of increase in activity against tuberculosis maintained, the white plague will be ranked in a class with some of the least dangerous of the infectious disease within less than fifty years.

HORTICULTURE

VALUE OF CULTIVATION.

Shown by Investigations of Certain New York State Orchards.

The experienced orchardist does not have to be told that it pays better to keep his orchard under cultivation than in sod, but not so with many orchard owners, who persist in trying to raise two good crops on the same soil. This of course cannot be accomplished to advantage and the sooner the farmer and small grower find it out and manage the operations accordingly the better it will be from a profit-making standpoint. The New York experiment station has recently completed an orchard survey of one of the counties of the state which presents some interesting and significant data with regard to the value of cultivation.

The results show that orchards tilled ten years or more yielded 327 bushels per acre with an income of $182; those tilled five years or more yielded 274 bushels, with an income of $133; those tilled over half of five years 225 bushels, with an income of $113.

Sod treatment for over half of five years yielded 222 bushels, with an income of $107; sod five years or more yielded 204 bushels, with an income of $108; sod ten years or more yielded 176 bushels, with an income of $87.

Computations taken from the above records show that the five-year average yields of orchards that have been tilled ten years is 86 per cent. larger than that of those that have been in sod ten years or more, and those tilled five years gave 34 per cent. better results than those in sod for five years.

These figures include all orchards examined. As most tilled orchards are accorded better attention than the ones left in sod there is a greater difference in favor of tillage. Because of this fact the station makes a second report of results found in which the neglected orchards are not considered. Under this kind of consideration orchards tilled ten years or more yielded 337 bushels, with an income of $189; tilled over five years yielded 296 bushels, with an income of $148; tilled over half of five years, yielded 234 bushels, with an income of $121.

Sod over half of five years yielded 242 bushels, with an income of $118; sod over five years or more yielded 258 bushels, with an income of $134; sod ten years or more yielded 232 bushels, with an income of $117.

ABOUT ORCHARD TREATMENT.

Which Is Best—Clean Culture or Sod Culture?

There is considerable interest in the minds of fruit growers about the question regarding the comparative value of the two systems of orchard treatment, clean culture and sod culture. Some very careful experiments under the supervision of the state stations, especially in Ohio and New York, have been conducted. And there are some practical fruit growers giving these plans the test of actual trial in a business way. So far there have been some rather conclusive results that others would do well to observe.

One of these is that on steep land it is very hazardous and often very wasteful of the fertility of the soil to practice clean culture. The waste by wash is too great. In such cases there can and should be some method of culture used that will prevent the soil waste, and only strips should be cultivated at most. These can be alternated so as to have the soil loose from tillage between rows running parallel with the slope, and in the rows a grass mulch, declares Prof. Van Deman, in Orange Judd Farmer. By this I mean that the grass, weeds, etc., be mowed and forked under the branches of the trees to serve as a mulch. By growing cowpeas in the interspaces and letting the crop rot on the ground, or pasturing it down by hogs, much fertility (nitrogen) may be added to the soil at almost no expense. If potash in the form of muriate or sulphate, and phosphorus in some of the preparations of bone or rock phosphate, are applied liberally, there should be no difficulty in keeping the soil rich.

National Apple Show.

At the National Apple show which has just closed at Spokane, Wash., prizes were awarded to exhibitors from various parts of the United States and Canada. Exhibits from the eastern and southern states were spoiled in transit and were not put on exhibition. Apples of all sizes and varieties were exhibited in the highest state of perfection, and with all the advantages which expert packing can produce. In addition to the fruit exhibits, there were demonstrations in spraying, packing and measuring machines, cider presses and nursery stock.

Club Root of Cabbages.

Club root of cabbage is one of the most annoying yet easily controlled diseases. To be on the safe side cabbage plants should be started in soil which has not been previously used for cabbage culture. A field in which the disease is found should for several years be kept free of cabbage, turnip, kale, wild mustard, etc., since the fungus winters over in the soil and thrives on any plants of the brassica family.

Health.

Bad as conditions are to-day, great progress has been made during the last 20 years. People are growing more careful as to what they eat and drink. There is no city that is not bestirring itself to improve its water supply and its system of sanitation. The demand for more fresh air is almost a fad in progressive communities.

For The National Forest Conservation

President Roosevelt sent to Congress last Friday an extended special message accompanying the report of the National Conservation Commission with its inventory of the natural resources of the nation.

The President declares that "the conservation of our resources is the fundamental question before this nation, and that our first and greatest task is to set our house in order and begin to live within our means,"

"The great basic facts are already well known," he says. "We know that our population is now adding about one fifth to its numbers in 10 years, and that by the middle of the present century perhaps 150,000,000 Americans, and by its end very many millions more, must be fed and clothed from the products of our soil. With the steady growth in population and the still more rapid increase in consumption our people will hereafter make greater, and not less demands per capita upon all the natural resources for their livelihood, comfort and convenience. It is high time to realize that our responsibility to the coming millions is like that of parents to their children, and that in wasting our resources we are wronging our descendants."

He points to the failure to develop and use our waterways, to the destruction of our forests and to the waste of $300,000,000 a year of our mineral resources. "Let us undertake without delay the investigations necessary before our people will be in a position, through State action or otherwise," he says, "to put an end to this huge loss and waste and conserve both our mineral resources and the lives of the men who take them from the earth."

"To be just and to be efficient are the two great requirements of national life," says the President, "National efficiency is the result of natural resources well handled, of freedom of opportunity for every man and of the inherent capacity, trained ability, knowledge and will, collectively and individually, to use that opportunity."

"This Administration has achieved some things," he says. "It has sought, but has not been able, to achieve others; it has doubtless made mistakes; but all it has done or attempted has been in the single consistent effort to secure and enlarge the rights and opportunities of the men and women of the United States. We are trying to conserve what is good in our social system, and we are striving toward this end when we endeavor to do away with what is bad. Success may be made too hard for some if it is made too easy for others. The rewards of common industry and thrift may be too small if the rewards for other, and on the whole less valuable, qualities are made too large, and especially if the rewards for qualities which are really, from the public standpoint, undesirable, are permitted to become too large. Our aim is as far as possible to provide such conditions that there shall be equality of opportunity where there is equality of energy, fidelity and intelligence; when there is a reasonable equality of opportunity the distribution of rewards will take care of itself."

"The unchecked existence of monopoly is incompatible with equality of opportunity," he continues. "The reason for the exercise of Government control over great monopolies is to equalize opportunities. We are fighting against privilege. It was made unlawful for corporation to contribute money for election expenses in order to abridge the power of special privilege at the polls. Railroad rate control is an attempt to secure an eqality of opportunity for all men affected by rail transportation and that means all of us. The great anthracite coal strike was settled and the pressing danger of a coal famine averted because we recognized that the control of a public necessity involves a duty to the people, and that public intervention in the affairs of a public service corporation is neither to be resented as usurpation nor permitted as a privilege by the corporations, but on the contrary, to be accepted as a duty and exercised as a right by the Government in the interest of all the people. The efficiency of the army and the navy has been increased so that our people may follow in peace the great work of making this country a better place for Americans to live in, and our navy was sent around the world for the same ultimate purpose. All the acts taken by the Government during the last seven years, and all the policies now being pursued by the Government, fit in as parts of a consistent whole.

"Our public land policy has for its aim the use of the public land so that it will promote local development by the settlement of home-makers; the policy we champion is to serve all the people legitimately and openly, instead of permitting the lands to be converted, illegitimately and under cover, to the private benefit of a few. Our forest policy was established so that we might use the public forests for the permanent public good, instead of merely for temporary private gain. The Reclamation act, under which the desert parts of the public domain are converted to higher uses for the general benefit, was passed so that more Americans might have homes on the land.

"These policies were enacted into law and have justified their enactment. Others have failed, so far, to reach the point of action. Among such is the attempt to secure public control of the open range and thus to convert its benefits to the use of the small man, who is the home-maker, instead of allowing it to be controlled by a few great cattle and sheep owners.

"The enactment of a pure food law was a recognition of the faith that the public welfare outweighs the right to private gain and that no man may poison the people for his private profit. The Employers' Liability bill recognized the controlling fact that while the employer usually has at stake no more than his profit, the stake of the employe is a living for himself and his family.

"We are building the Panama canal, and this means that we are engaged in the giant engineering feat of all times. We are striving to add in all ways to the habitability and beauty of our country. We are striving to hold in the public hands the remaining supply of unappropriated coal, for the protection and benefit of all the people. We have taken the first steps toward the conservation of our natural resources and the betterment of country life and the improvement of our waterways. We stand for the right of every child to a childhood free from grind and toil and to an education, for the civic possibility and decency of every citizen, for prudent foresight in public matters, and for fair play in every relation of our national and economic life. In international matters we apply a system of diplomacy which puts the obligations of international morality on a level with those that govern the actions of an honest gentleman in dealing with his fellowmen. Within our own border we stand for truth and honesty in public and in private life, and we war sternly against wrongdoers of every grade. All these efforts are integral parts of the same attempt—the attempt to enthrone justice and righteousness, secure freedom of opportunity to all our citizens, now and hereafter, and to set the ultimate interest of all of us above the temporary interests of any individual, class or group.

"The nation, its government and its resources exist, first of all, for the American citizen, where his creed, race or birthplace, whether he be rich or poor, educated or ignorant, provided only that he is a good citizen, recognizing his obligations to the nation for the rights and opportunities which he owes to the nation.

"The obligation and not the rights of citizenship increase in proportion to the increase of a man's wealth or power. The time is coming when a man will be judged not by what he has succeeded in getting for himself from the common store, but by how well he has done his duty as a citizen, and by what the ordinary citizen has gained in freedom of opportunity because of his service for the common good. The highest value we know is that of the individual citizen, and the highest justice is to give him fair play in the effort to realize the best there is in him.

"The tasks this nation has to do are great tasks. They can only be done at by our citizens acting together, and they can be done best of all by the direct and simple application of homely common sense. The application of common sense to common problems for the common good, under the guidance of the principles upon which this republic was based, and by virtue of which it exists, spells perpetuity for the nation, civil and industrial liberty for its citizens, and freedom of opportunity in the pursuit of happiness for the plain American, for whom this nation was founded, by whom it was preserved and through whom alone it can be perpetuated. Upon this platform—larger than party differences, higher than class prejudice, broader than any question of profit and loss—there is room for every American who realizes that the common good stands first."

In his special recommendations the President says:

"The first requisite for waterway improvement is the control of the waters in such manner as to reduce floods and regulate the regimen of the navigable rivers. The second requisite is development of terminals and connections in such manner as to regulate commenee.

"Accordingly I urge that the broad plan for the development of our waterways, recommended by the Inland Waterway Commission, be put in effect without delay. It provides for a comprehensive system of waterway improvements extending to all the uses of the waters and benefits to be derived from their control, including navigation, the development of power, the extension of irrigation, the drainage of swamps and overflow lands; the prevention of soil wash, and the purification of streams for water supply. It proposes to carry out the work by co-ordinating agencies in the Federal Departments through the medium of an administrative commission or board acting in co-operation with the States and other organizations and individual citizens."

"I urge that provision be made for both protection and more rapid development of the national forest.

"The time has fully arrived for recognizing in the law the responsibility to the community, the State, and the nation which rests upon the private owners of the lands. The ownership of forest land is a public trust. The man who would so handle his forest as to cause erosion and to injure stream flow must be not only educated, but he must be controlled."

"Second only in importance to good fire laws well enforced is the enactment of tax laws which will permit the perpetuation of existing forests by use."

"The remaining public lands should be classified and the arable lands disposed of to home-makers. In their interest the Timber and Stone act and the commutation clause of the Homestead act should be repealed, and the Desert Land law should be modified in accordance with the recommendations of the Public Land Commisiion.

"The use of the public grazing lands should be regulated in such ways as to improve and conserve their value.

"Rights to the surface of the public land should be separated from rights to forests upon it and to minerals beneath it, and these should be the subject to separate disposal.

"The coal, oil, gas and phosphate rights still remaining with the Government should be withdrawn from entry and leased under conditions favorable for economic development.

"The consumption of nearly all of our mineral products is increasing more rapidly than population. Our mineral waste is about one-sixth of our product, or nearly $1,000,000 for each working day in the year. The loss of structural materials through fire is about another million a day. The loss of life in the mines is appalling. The larger part of these losses of life and property can be avoided.

"It is of the utmost importance that a Bureau of Mines be established in accordance with the pending bill to reduce the loss of life in the mines and the waste of mineral resources and to investigate the methods and substitutes for prolonging the duration of our mineral supplies."

WILL COST $1,000,000 TO HARNESS YOUGH RIVER

Extensive Plans Mapped Out by Youghiogheny Power Company.

The plans of the Youghiogheny Power company, chartered by the circuit court for Garrett county to harness the Youghiogheny river, mention of which was made in the e columns two weeks ago, include the erection of three dams, 30, 75 and 100 feet high respectively, which will accumulate enough water for turbines to develop 15,000 horse power. The estimate cost of the plant is $1, 00,000. The Western Maryland Coal & Coke company is behind the enterprise and the plant will be located near Friendsville. Arrangements for building the plant will be given consideration soon. The Western Maryland Coal & Coke company owns 11,000 acres on both sides of the river. Clifford L. Pullen of New York is general manager of the company and William A. Morgart of Cumberland, is intesested in the project.

WAR CLAIMS ALLOWED.

Harmon W. Hesen Will Recieve $2,035 and William Moody $400.

In the United States Senate last Friday the Court of Claims bill carrving an appropriation of more than two millions of dollars, passed that branch of the National Congress and was immediately transmitted to the House for concurrence in amendments made to the bill by the Senate, the measure having passed the House some time ago.

The bill is of interest to some local people as it provides for the payment of two War claims to Garrett countians, the parties being Messrs. Harmon W. Hesen of Oakland, and William Moody, of Bloomington. The original claim of Mr. Hesen amounted to nearly $5,000 for blacksmithing done for the Union forces while the soldiers were in Oakland or passing through. The Court of Claims, however, scaled the bill down to $2,035 which amount Mr. Hesen will rtly receive.

Mr. Moody's claim amounting to about $400 was for services rendered as postmaster during the war.

Revival Meeting Still in Progress

The revival at St. Paul's M. E. church, which begun several weeks ago under the pastorate of Rev. J. B. Workman, is still in progress. So far two conversions have resulted with a number of seekers at the altar. The attendance has not been large at any time but those who are regular attendants at the nightly meetings are deriving much benefit. On Monday night Rev. John M. Davis preached a splendid sermon, since which time Rev. Workman has been preaching each night.

LOCAL TEACHERS' INSTITUTE

Held in Oakland Saturday Which Was Largely Attended.

A local teachers' institute was held last Saturday, Jan. 30th, in the High School building with a large number of teachers, patrons and pupils present. Mr. H. A. Loraditch, presideent of the Garrett County Teachers' Association, presided.

The morning session opened with a song, "Maryland, My Maryland," followed by responsive scripture reading led by Principal U. G. Palmer. Mr. W. E. Bishoff made everybody feel welcome in a short address, which was heartily responded to by Mr. A. W. DeWitt, of Deer Park.

The real work of the institute was begun by Miss Jennie Miller, giving a model lesson in primary reading with her class. Great skill was displayed on the part of Miss Miller in conducting this lesson, and too much cannot be said in favor of her methods and the results she obtained. This being only a preparation lesson the children were l d by concert reading to get the thoughts expressed and also to become familiar with the words so that they could read at sight. The regular lesson would be individual sightreading by the pupils. Another model lesson was given by Miss Olive DeWitt and her pupils in primary numbers, in which Miss DeWitt showed that by using numbers concretely the children could be taught the combinations readily, using sticks, boxes, pieces of crayon, etc. These model lessons given by the teachers illustrated actual school work and gave the observer, in a few minutes, what he could not have gained from books in a much longer time.

A chorus by a number of Miss Miller's pupils was next on the program.

Mr. Palmer proved to be a master of his subject, "The Globe and Its Uses." By using two globes, carrying one, representing the earth, around the other, representing the sun, to show the change of seasons. Other practical suggestions were also given. The approach of the noon hour brought this very interesting subject to a close.

At 1:30 p. m. work of the institute was again taken up. After the song, "America," Miss Jessie Conneway, in a very pleasing manner discussed Orthography, revealing much thought on the part of the speaker.

Miss Annie DeBerry opened the subject of mental arithmetic, which discussion was entered into by Messrs. A. W. DeWitt, Fred. Smith, U. G. Palmer and E. A. Browning.

A vocal solo was rendered by Miss Orpah Ashby, a member of the Senior Class of the High School, which everyone seemed to enjoy. Miss Margeerite Hart gave a recitation. This young lady not only recited well, but displayed some talent along that line. The audience was then treated to a song by several High School girls.

Miss Cora Weimer gave some good suggestions on the subject of Tardiness.

"Factoring in Algebra," by Mr. A. W. DeWitt, was well handled by that able teacher. Constant drill and repetition until the underlying principles were mastered was his main thought conveyed to the teachers.

Many good questions were asked and points gained by means of the Question Box, conducted by Misses Zaidee Browning and Elizabeth Leary.

Miss Orley Dunham gave an oral lesson in Geography with her class. She selected the New England states for her subject, and with an outline map on the board the pupils were able to point out the important cities, rivers, etc., telling each state's chief productions and occupations, how and when they were settled, making a general review of the whole group of states.

Miss Marion Leary made a few remarks on reviews and examinations. In her talk she gave some of her own methods of reviewing lessons.

The meeting closed with several remarks and announcements by Supt. E. A. Browning, which were of interest, not only to the teachers present, but to all teachers in the county. He asked for opinions and expressions from the teachers on summer schools and institutes. He also discussed the teachers' examination on the course of study for the schools of Maryland, suggesting June 28th as a suitable time for holding such an examination. He further said that more blackboards and tablets would be furnished the schools next year. By this he conveyed the idea that a tablet and pencil with proper instruction would be of more use to the children than so many books. He also appealed to the teachers to do their part in welcoming the State Teachers' Association to Mt. Lake Park next June.

Our teachers are to be commended for their interest and enthusiasm displayed at these local institutes and for their efforts in raising the standard of education in Garrett county.

FRIENDSVILLE WILL STAY DRY FOR ANOTHER YEAR

Vote on the Question of License Was Taken Tuesday, the "Drys" Winning

At the annual municipal election held in Friendsville on Teusday of this week the temperance people scored a signal victory over the wets when they carried the proposition of "no license" by a vote of 49 to 36, a majority of 13 against license, and elected four members of the town council by large majorities.

Under the provisions of the Charter of the town the question of license or no license may be submitted to the voters who are property owners at each succeeding annual election by filing with the proper officials of the municipality a notice to that effect, said notice to be given at least thirty days in advance of the election.

Under the provision a petition was filed with the council by those favoring the granting of license and a vote was taken on Tuesday with the result as above stated

Last year a like election was held when the temperance people won by a majority of seven votes, thus closing the saloons in the town after May 1st as provided in the law.

Members of Council elected Tuesday to serve for the period of two years with the number of votes they received were C. V. Guard, 70; H. J. Black, 75; M. E. Frazee, 41. The defeated candidates were J. S. Lish, who received 17 votes; J. G. Kolb, 21, and Willlam Ryland, 20.

W. F. East was elected to Council for one year, having received 43 votes. His opponent Charles Glover, received 24 votes.

Mr. B. F. Friend was elected Mayor last year and has one year yet to serve.

The elected Councilmen are all avowed temperance people.

PEOPLE FLOCK TO THE SIDE OF THE PRESIDENT

Fight With Congress Stirs Country To Pen Indorsement.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The whole nation seems to have taken its pen in hand, not to mention its typewriter, to indite a few lines of cheer and consolation to the Presid t. Epistles of encouragement from th "common people," as they are still som times called, continue to flow into the W te House about as fast as Uncle Sam's mail carriers can keep them moving.

These letters, as a rule, are commendatory of the President's course on many subjects and condemnatory as respects Congress. All manner of verbal bricks are thrown at the Senate and House in these missives from the public. Under the circumstances, it is not to be wondered at that the President never losses sleep or flesh or suffers even impairment of appetite when he has a fight on with Congress. It heightens his popularity too rapidly for him to suffer keenly from it, if one can judge by the letters he gets. These letters are a distinct indication to the President that the masses of the people are with him in the differences he has with Congress, or in the great majority of those differences.

The controversy over the Secret Service brought forth hundreds of letters to the President from all parts of the land. But this is n t the only subject on which his constituents write him, upholding him and scoring Congress. Representative Willett's attack has resulted in many letters. The Panama canal libel case has wrought up many of the President's admirers. They are writing him to take drastic action with the persons who have been guilty of any slanderous criticism. The President's stand on the question of water rights has brought forth much approval.

Many other similar cases might be cited, illustrative of the fact that when the President takes a stand for anything the disposition of the country is to rally to his support. Some of the members of Congress would better understand the extent of the President's popularity if they could look over the files containing the letter he gets. At the same time that the President is getting letters of approval there is a bombardment of letters against the Capitol, assailing Congress for its course in various matters.

Traveling men are among those who write many letters to the President. They come in touch with many people, and if their letters are based on the facts, they find that popular sentiment is with Roosevelt. One Boston traveling man wrote to the President asking him to read a certain verse of Corinhians, which ran: "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

"Columbia is proud of you," is the word from a man in the Missouri-Pacific Railway Company office in St. Louis. "God forbid that we ever forget the great principles you taught us to stand for," is the message that comes from a home for dependent children in Indiana. These letters begin "Our Dear President." An Illinois alderman writes that he has asked his member of the House of Representatives "to break away from the bunch that is fighting the President, the only friend the people have in Washington."

A great many of the letters received by the President are from people who have little accomplishment in the way either of writing or spelling. Some of these letters, however, are the most pleasing to the President, because of their earnestness and evident sincerity. Resolutions in considerable numbers have been adopted by meetings of citizens and various organizations indorsing the President. Until this winter there has been little of this, but when the President got into collision with Congress over the issue of the Secret-Service, then the resolutions began to break out.

Illustrating this, the plain people up at Holland Patent, New York, the old home of Grover Cleveland, met and prepared a letter, signed by the officials of the village, members of the board of education, bankers, preachers, business men, laborers and others. These resolutions commended the President for the stand he had taken "for honesty and the detection of crime."

Evidence that the common people are with the President is seen in this letter from a man in a country town in West Virginia:

"The common people rule this country and the common people alone. The common people have always been behind you in your fight for a square deal, and the common people are still behind you in your fight with Congress."

One of the interesting facts in connection with the attack on the President by Representative Willett of New York was that this attack was made on the same day the President wrote his letter honoring Gen. Robert E. Lee. The result is that the President has received numerous letters from Confederate veterans strongly upholding him.

Anyone who has the opportunity to look over the President's letters from the public will find them illuminating as well as entertaining, and will become skeptical of any statements that the President as he nears March 4 is losing his grip on the people.

A MIGHTY DRY SEASON.

"Here, in 'the very mild and hollow,' as it were, of the winter, the serious purpose of the season still seems obliviscated," remarked our venerable contemporary, the Springfield Republican. Obliviscated? We should say so! Not only that, but obnubilated, obumbrated, obtenebrated and obfuscated. The season has concealed its purpose with perfect art. No one knows whither we are drifting. As the Republican well observes, "After a summer of dryness and sweetness—light and grace masking a sad disregard of their rivals, the gloom of the skies and the lightnings and tempests—there followed the loviest of autumns, and yet so dry." Yes, that's it! It was the same all through the South. The summer was sweet, but there were lightnings and gloom, and legislatures, and then the whole country seemed to go dry.

Up Springfield way, it appears, "the moist rushing clouds, tawny tinted, and lighted by breaking prisms of sunlight, were such as, were it a month later, would lead one to the sunny banks of brooks on the mountains to find hepaticas, and bring the bluebirds to the roadside thickets." Well, it's nearly the same down in Virginia and Tennessee. The clouds were lighted by sunlight, just the same, and as they rushed by they seemed to lead the thirsty wayfarer to sunny mountain stills to find hectic inspiration, and bring joy riders to roadside taverns.

But it was dry, very dry, both for bluebirds and for men. "It has been thought by many that starvation was a stimulant," observes the Springfield nature-lover, but he concludes that this theory is wrong: "Starvation isn't good for any grade of life, neither vegetable nor animal." That's true; it is a poor stimulant.

EFFORTS TO STAMP OUT THE WHITE PLAGUE

To Urge Registration of Cases and Disinfection of Homes of Afflicted.

The Maryland Association for the Prevention and Relief of Tuberculosis has organized a systematic campaign in the counties of the state for the purpose of awakening an interest in the work. Already meetings have been held in Wicomico, Talbot, Cecil and Worcester counties. At Princess Anne a tuberculosis exhibit has been placed in the courthouse.

Secretary Price states that Somerset, St. Mary's and Calvert counties were more in need of sanitary improvement than any others in the state. In Somerset little or no attention has been paid to the law requiring the registration of tnberculosis cases and the disinfection of houses in which diseased persons lived. The death rate here for tuberculosis from March 31 to January 1 of this year was 22.24 percent, on a basis of 10,000 inhabitants. This is only exceeded by the States of California and Colorado, where consumptives go to regain health. The report shows that of the 30 physicians in the county only 4 registered cases, and that there were disinfected only 11 of the 31 houses in which deaths occurred.

The last legislature passed a law making it mandatory on physicians and heads of institutions to register cases and on the county authorities to disinfect. The act was hardly stringent enough to cover the registration provisions, and it will be improved at the next session. But the County Commissioners will have to be more vigilant. Recently they were warned by the state board that they would be mandamused if they fail to comply with the law.

It is the purpose of the association, acting in conjunction with the state health board, to visit every Eastern Shore and Southern Maryland county with the view of awakening the people to their danger. The greater percentage of cases are reported from those counties having a large negro population, the colored people failing to pay proper attention to the sanitary surroundings.

Singularly enough, Garrett is also numbered among the counties in which the safeguards against disease are insufficient. It is not tuberculosis here, but typhoid and kindred troubles. The state board intends to pay some attention to this county.

DIXON & KELSO

DIXON & KELSO invite their customers and the buying public to bring one of the Big Store's famous price lists with them when they come to town. We will be glad to sell goods at these prices and if the purchase is large will give a nice treat in addition.

The railroad company records will show that we purchase at least 3 times as many carloads of merchandise during any one year as the so-called Big Store and do not take off our hats to any of them when it comes to making low prices.

DIXON & KELSO.

P. S.—Our hay house is now completed and we can take care of GOOD BALED HAY in most any quantities.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIV.

Fever and Fire and Fear.

BY nightfall Winthrope was tossing and groaning on the bed of leaves which Miss Leslie had heaped beneath his canopy. Though not delirious, his high temperature, coupled with the pains which racked every nerve and bone in his body, rendered him light-headed. He would catch himself up in the midst of some rambling nonsense to inquire anxiously whether he had said anything silly or strange. On being reassured upon this, he would relax again, and, as likely as not, break into a babyish wail over his aches and pains.

Blake shook his head when he learned that the attack had not been preceded by a chill.

"Guess he's in for a hot time," he said. "There is more'n one kind of malarial fever. Some are a whole lot like typhus."

"Typhus? What is that?" asked Miss Leslie.

"Sort of rapid fire, double action typhoid. Not that I think Win's got it—only malaria. What gets me is that we've only been here these few days, and yet it looks like he's got the continuous, no-chill kind."

"Then you think he will be very ill?"

"Well, I guess he'll think so. It ought to run out in a week or ten days, though. We've had good water, and it usually takes time for malaria to soak in deep. Now, don't worry, Miss Jenny. It'll do him no good, and you a lot of harm. Take things easy as you can, for you've got to keep up your strength. If you don't, you'll be down yourself before Win is up."

"Ill while he is helpless and unable— Oh, no; that cannot be! I must not give way to the fever until—"

"Don't worry. You'll likely stave it off for a couple of weeks or so. You're lively yet, and that's a good sign. I knew Win was in for it when he began to grouch and loaf and do the baby act. I haven't much use for dudes in general, and English dudes in particular; but I'll admit that, while Win's soft enough in spots, he's not all mush and milk."

"Thank you, Mr. Blake."

"You're welcome. I couldn't say less, seeing that Win can't speak for himself. Now you tumble in and get a good sleep. I'll go on as night nurse, and work at the barricade same time. You're not going to do any night-nursing. I can gather the thorn-brush in the afternoons, and pile it up at night."

In the morning Miss Leslie found that Blake had built a substantial canopy over the invalid, in place of the first ramshackle structure.

"It's best for him to be out in the air," he explained; "so I fixed this up to keep off the dew. But whenever it rains, we'll have to tote him inside."

"Ah, yes; to be sure. How is he?" murmured the girl.

"He's about the same this morning. But he got a little sleep. Keep him dosed with all the hot broth he'll take. And say, roust me out at noon. I've had my breakfast. Now I'll have a snooze. So long!"

He nodded, and crawled under the shade of the nearest bush, too drowsy to observe her look of dismay.

At noon, having learned that Winthrope's condition showed little change, Blake ate a hearty meal, and [illegible] set off down the cleft. He did not reappear until nightfall; though at intervals Miss Leslie had heard his step as he came up the ravine with his loads of thorn-brush.

This course of action became the routine for the following ten days. It was broken only by three incidents all relating to the important matter of food supply. Winthrope had soon tired of broth, and showed such an insatiable craving for cocoanut milk that the stock on hand had become exhausted within the week.

The day after, Blake took the rope ladder, as he called the tangle of knotted creepers, and went off towards the north end of the cleft. When he returned, a little before dark, the lower part of his trousers was torn to shreds, and the palms of his hands were blistered and raw; but he carried a heavy load of cocoanuts. After a vain attempt to climb the giant palms on the far side of the river, he had found another grove near at hand, in the little plain, and had succeeded in reaching the tops of two of the smaller palms.

Under his directions, Miss Leslie clarified a bowl of bird fat—goose-grease, Blake called it—and dressed his hands. Yet even with the bandages which she made of soft inner bark and the handkerchiefs, he was unable to handle the thorn-brush the following day. Unfortunately for him, he was not content to sit idle. During the night he had cut a bamboo fishing pole and lengthened Miss Leslie's line of plaited cocoanut-fiber with a long catgut leader. In the afternoon he completed his outfit with a hairpin hook and a piece of half-dried meat.

He was back an hour earlier than usual, and he brought with him a dozen or more fair-sized fish. His mouth was watering over the prospective feast, and Miss Leslie showed herself hardly less eager for a change from their monotonous diet. As the fish were already dressed, she raked up the coals and quickly contrived a grill of green bamboos.

When the odor of the broiling fish spread about in the still air, even Winthrope sniffed and turned over, while Blake watched the crisping delicacies with a ravenous look. Unable to restrain himself, he caught up the smallest fish, half cooked, and bolted it down with such haste that he burnt his mouth. He ran over to the spring for a drink, and Winthrope cackled derisively.

Miss Leslie was too absorbed in her cooking to observe the result of Blake's greediness. She had turned the fish for the last time, and was about to lift them off the fire, when Blake came running back, and sent grill and all flying with a violent kick.

"Salt!" he gasped—"where's the salt? I'm poisoned!"

"Poisoned?"

"Poison fish! Don't eat! God!—Where's the salt?"

The girl stared at him. His agony was so great that beads of sweat were rolling down his face. He writhed, and stretched out a quivering hand—"Salt, quick!—warm water—salt!"

"But there's none left! You remember, yesterday—"

"God!" groaned Blake, and for a moment he sank down, overcome by a racking convulsion. Then his jaw closed like a bulldog's, and gritting his teeth with the effort, he staggered up and rushed off down the cleft.

"Stop! stop, Mr. Blake! Where are you going?" screamed the girl.

She started to run after him, but was halted by an outburst of delirious laughter. Winthrope was sitting upright and waving his fever-blotched hands—"Hi, hi! look at 'im run! 'E's got w'at'll do for 'im! Run, you swine; you—"

There followed a torrent of cockney abuse so foul that Miss Leslie blushed scarlet with shame as she sought to quiet him. But the excitement had so heightened his fever that he was in a raving delirium. It was close upon midnight before his temperature fell, and he sank into a death-like torpor. In her ignorance, she supposed that he had fallen asleep.

Her relief was short-lived, for soon she remembered Blake. She could see him lying beside the pool or out on the bare plain, his resolute eyes cold and glassy, his powerful body contorted in the death agony. The vision filled her with dismay. With all his coarseness, the man had showed himself so resourceful, so indomitable, that when she sought to dwell upon her reasons to fear him, she found herself admiring his virile manliness. He might be a brute, but he did not belong among the jackals and hyenas. Indeed, as she called to mind his strong face and frank, blunt speech she all but disbelieved what her own ears had heard.

And anyway, without his aid, what should she do? Winthrope had already become as weak as a child. The emaciation of his jaundiced features was a mockery of their former plumpness. Blake had said that the fever might run on for another week, and that even if Winthrope recovered, he would probably be helpless for several days besides.

What was no less serious, though she had concealed the fact from Blake, she herself had been troubled the past week with the depression and lassitude which had preceded Winthrope's attack. If Blake was dead, and she should fall ill before Winthrope recovered, they would both die from lack of care. And if they did not die of the fever, what of their future, here on this desolate savage coast?

But the very keenness of her mental anguish so exhausted and numbed the girl's brain that she at last fell into a heavy sleep. The fire burned low, and shadowy forms began to creep from behind the bamboos and the trees and rocks down the gorge. There was no sound; but greedy, wolfish eyes gleamed in the starlight.

Only the day before Blake had told Miss Leslie to store the last rack of cured meat inside the baobab. The two sleepers lay between the fire and the entrance to the hollow. Slowly the embers of the fire died away into gray ashes, and slowly the night prowlers drew nearer. The boldest of the pack crept close to Miss Leslie, and, with teeth bared and back bristling, sniffed at the edge of her skirt. Whether because of her heavy breathing or the odor of the leopard skin, the beast drew away, with an uneasy whine.

There was a pause; then, backed by three others, the leader approached Winthrope. He was still lying in the death-like torpor, and he lacked the protection which, in all likelihood, the leopard skin had given Miss Leslie. The cowardly brutes took him for dead or dying. They sniffed at him from head to foot, and then, with a ferocious outburst of snarls and yells, flung themselves upon him.

Had it not chanced that Winthrope was lying upon his side, with one arm thrown up, he would have been fatally wounded by the first slashing bites of his assailants. The two which sought to tear him were baffled by the thick folds of Blake's coat, while their leader's slash at the victim's throat was barred by the upraised arm. With a savage snap, the beast's jaws closed on the arm, biting through to the bone. At the same instant the fourth jackal tore ravenously at one of the outstretched legs.

With a shriek of agony, Winthrope started up from his torpor, and struck out frantically in a fury of pain and terror. Startled by the violence of this unexpected resistance, the jackals leaped back—only to spring in again as the remainder of the pack made a rush to forestall them.

Winthrope was staggering to his feet, when the foremost brute leaped upon him. He fell heavily against one of the main supports of his bamboo canopy, and the entire structure came down with a crash. Two of the jackals, caught beneath the roof, howled with fear as they sought to free themselves. The others, with brute dread of an unknown danger, drew away, snarling and gnashing their teeth.

Wakened by the first ferocious yelps of Winthrope's assailants, Miss Leslie had started up and stared about in the darkness. On all sides she could see pairs of fiery eyes and dim forms like the phantom creatures of a nightmare. Winthrope's shriek, instead of spurring her to action, only confused her the more and benumbed her faculties. She thought it was his death cry, and stood trembling, transfixed with horror.

Then came the fall of the canopy. His cries as he sought to throw it off showed that he was still alive. In a flash her bewilderment vanished. The stagnant blood surged again through her arteries in a fiery, stimulating torrent. With a cry, to which primeval instinct lent a menacing note, she groped her way to the fallen canopy, and stooped to lift up one side.

The Girl Was More Frantic.

"Quick!—into the tree!" she called.

Still frantic with terror, Winthrope struggled to his feet. She thrust him towards the baobab, and followed, dragging the mass of interwoven bamboos. Emboldened by the retreat of their quarry, the snarling pack instantly began to close in. Fortunately they were too cowardly to rush at once, and fear spurred their intended victims to the utmost haste. Groping and stumbling, the two felt their way to the baobab, and Miss Leslie pushed Winthrope headlong through the entrance. As he fell, she turned to face the pack.

The foremost beasts were at the rear edge of the bamboo framework, their eyes close to the ground. Instinct told her that they were crouching to leap. With desperate strength she caught up the canopy before her like a great shield, and drew it in after her until the ends of the cross-bars were wedged fast against the sides of the opening. Though it seemed so firm, she clung to it with a convulsive grasp as she felt the pack leaders fling themselves against the outer side.

But Blake had lashed the bamboos securely together, and none of the beasts was heavy enough to snap the supple bars. Finding that they could not break down the barrier, they began to scratch and tear at the thatch which covered the frame. Soon a pair of lean jaws thrust in and snapped at the girl's skirt. She sprang back, with a cry: "Help! Quick, Mr. Winthrope! They're breaking through!"

Winthrope made no response. She stooped, and found him lying inert where he had fallen. She had only herself to depend upon. A screen of sharp sticks which she had made for the entrance was leaning against the inner wall, within easy reach. To grasp it and thrust it against the other framework was the work of an instant.

Still she trembled, for the eager beasts had ripped the thatch from the canopy, and their inthrust jaws made short work of the few leaves on her screen. Unaware that even a lion or a tiger is quickly discouraged by the knife-like splinters of broken bamboo, she expected every moment that the jackals would bite their way through her frail barrier.

She remembered the sharpened stakes of her screen, hidden under the leaves and grass of her bed. She groped her way across the hollow and uncovered one of the stakes. In her haste she cut her hand on its razor-like edge. All unheeding, she sprang back towards the entrance. She was none too soon. One of the smaller jackals had forced its head and one leg between the bars, and was struggling to enlarge the opening.

Fearful that the whole pack was about to burst in upon her, the girl grasped the bamboo stake in both hands, and began stabbing and lunging at the beast with all her strength. The jackal squirmed and snarled and snapped viciously. But the girl was now frantic. She pressed nearer, and though the white teeth grazed her wrist, she drove home a thrust that changed the beast's snarls into a howl of pain. Before she could strike again, it had struggled back out of the hole, beyond reach.

Tense and panting with excitement, she leaned forward, ready to stab at the next beast. None appeared, and presently she became aware that the pack had been daunted by the experience of their unlucky fellow. Their snarls and yells had subsided to whines, which seemed to be coming from a greater distance. Still she waited, with the bamboo stake upraised ready to strike, every nerve and muscle of her body tense with the strain.

So great was the stress of her fear and excitement that she had not heeded the first gray lessening of the night. But now the glorious tropical dawn came streaming out of the east in all its red effulgence. Above and through the bamboo barrier glowed a light such as might have come from a great fire on the cliff top. Still tense and immovable, the girl stared out up the cleft. There was not a jackal in sight. She leaned forward and peered around, unable to believe such good fortune. But the night prowlers had slunk off in the first gray dawn.

The girl drew in a deep, shuddering sigh, and sank back. Her hand struck against Winthrope's foot. She turned about quickly and looked at him. He was lying upon his face. She hastened to turn him upon his side, and to feel his forehead. It was cool and moist. He was fast asleep and drenched with sweat. The great shock of his pain and fear and excitement had broken his fever.

With the relief and joy of this discovery, the girl completely relaxed. Not observing Winthrope's wounds, which had bled little, she sought to force a way out through the entrance. It was by no means an easy task to free the wedged framework, and when, after much pulling and pushing, she at last tore the mass loose, she found herself perspiring no less freely than Winthrope.

She was far too preoccupied, however, to consider what this might mean. Her first thought was of a fire. She ran to her rude stone fireplace and raked over the ashes. They were still warm, but there was not a live ember among them. Yet she realized that Winthrope must have hot food when he awakened, and Blake had carried with him the magnifying glass. For a little she stood hesitating. But the defeat of the jackals had given her courage and resolution such as she had never before known. She returned into the cave, and chose the sharpest of her stakes. Having made certain that Winthrope was still asleep, she set off boldly down the cleft.

At the first turn she came upon Blake's thorn barricade. It stretched across the narrowest part of the cleft in an impenetrable wall, 12 feet high. Only in the center was a gap, which could have been filled by Blake in less than two hours' work. The girl's eyes brightened. She herself could gather the thorn-brush and fill the gap before night. They no longer need fear the jackals or even the larger beasts of prey. None the less, they must have fire.

Spurred on by the thought, she was about to spring through the barricade when she heard the tread of feet on the path beyond. She crouched down, and peered through the tangle of brush in the edge of the gap. Less than ten paces away Blake was plodding heavily up the trail. She stepped out before him.

"You—you! Are you alive?" she gasped.

"Live? You bet your boots!" came back the grim response. "You bet I'm alive—though I had to go Jonah one better to do it. The whale heaved him up; I heaved up the whale—and it took about a barrel of sea-water to do it."

"Sea-water?"

"Sure . . . I tumbled over twice on the way. But I made the beach. Lord! how I pumped in the briny deep! Guess I won't go into details—but if you think you know anything about seasickness— Whew! Lucky for yours truly, the tide was just starting out, and the wind off shore. I'd fallen in the water, and the Jonah business laid me out cold. Didn't know anything until the tide came up again and soused me."

"I am very glad you're not dead. But how you must have suffered! You are still white, and your face is all creased."

Blake attempted a careless laugh. "Don't worry about me. I'm here, O. K., all that's left,—a little wobbly on my pins, but hungry as a shark. But say, what's up with you? You're sweating like a— Good thing, though. It'll stave off your spell of fever a while. How'd you happen to be coming down here so early?"

"I was starting to find you."

"Me!"

"Not you—that is, I thought you were dead. I was going to make certain, and to—to get the burning-glass."

"U-m-m. I see. Let the fire go out, eh?"

"Do not blame me, Mr. Blake! I was so ill and worn out, and I've paid for it twice over, really I have. Didn't those awful beasts attack you?"

"Beasts? How's that?" he demanded.

"Oh, but you must have heard them! The horrid things tried to kill us!" she cried, and she poured out a half incoherent account of all that had happened since he left.

Blake listened intently, his jaw thrust out, his eyes glowing upon her with a look which she had never before seen in any man's eyes. But his first comment had nothing to do with her conduct.

"How's that?—sorry Win got roused out of his nice little snooze—Why, don't you know, we'd been all alone in our glory by to-night if it hadn't been for those brutes. He was in the stupor, and that would have been the end of him if the beasts hadn't stirred him up so lively. I've heard of such a thing before, but I always thought it was a fake. Here you are sweating, too."

"I feel much better than yesterday. I did not tell you, but I have felt ill for nearly a week."

"'Fraid to tell, eh?—and you were so scared over the beasts— Scared! By Jiminy, you've got grit, little woman! There's two kinds of scaredness. You've got the Stonewall Jackson kind. If anybody asks you, just refer them to Tommy Blake."

"Thank you, Mr. Blake. But should we not hasten back now to prepare something for Mr. Winthrope?"

"Ditto for yours truly. I'm like that sepulchre you read about—white outside, and within nothing but bare bones and emptiness."

Work with a Will.

We are not sent into this world to do anything into which we cannot put our hearts. We have certain work to do for our bread and that is to be done strenuously; other work to do for our delight and that is to be done heartily; neither is to be done by halves or shifts, but with a will; and what is not worth this effort is not to be done at all.—John Ruskin.

Grand Success, But—

Elevator girls may be a grand success, but could one of them smooth her pompadour without taking her hand off the controller, and who would swear at the automatic door?—St. Louis Republic.

Art.

Now nature is not at variance with art, nor art with nature; they being both the servants of his providence. Art is the perfection of nature. Were the world now as it was the sixth day, there were yet a chaos. Nature hath made one world and art another. In brief, all things are artificial; for nature is the art of God.—Sir Thomas Browne.

The Baffling Language.

English is the only form of human speech of which it can be said that it is not sufficient to know it in order to be able to use it. The Frenchman in England will find it better to speak in French. The Englishman prefers to try his French rather than to listen at your clumsy attempts at English. If any language has to be murdered, he would rather it be that of somebody else.—Paris Opinion.

Her Kick.

"I don't mind finding a gray hair or two in my own hair," sighed the bachelor girl, who shows some few signs of the sere and yellow leaf, "but when I pay $3 for a nice bunch of lovely brown curls and have to pick them out of those, too, it isn't fair. Do you think it is?"

The Illyrians.

The Illyrian province formed a short-lived government, being instituted by Napoleon in 1809, from various territories taken from Austria, north and east of the Adriatic. The government was abolished in 1814-15. The ancient Illyrians are now represented by the Albanians, which fact doubtless gave the little kingdom its title.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord; but they that deal truly are his delight.—Prov. 12:22.

TIME.—Vs. 32-35 probably cover a period of some length. The exact date of the Ananias incident is unknown. Between A. D. 30 and 34.

PLACE.—Jerusalem. Probably at the usual meeting place of the disciples.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

V. 36. "Joses." One form of "Joseph." "Surnamed Barnabas." A Hebrew name, derived from bar, son, and Nabuah "prophesying," pouring out words as from a fountain, the impelling force being the divine inspiration." "The name seems to have been conferred upon him by the general consent of his friends, as a kind of degree or pet name."—Biblical World.

Being interpreted from Hebrew into Greek, The son of consolation, "comforting," "exhortation," as in the R. V. Neither definition alone is complete; it takes both to give the meaning of the original Greek word, which is the same word as that given to the Holy Spirit by Jesus (John 14:16), "the Comforter," "Paraclete," from para, to the side of, and kaleo, to call or summon, for comfort or help as an advocate, counselor, comforter.

What Barnabas, filled with the Holy Spirit, did for others was similar, at least in most respects, to that which the Holy Spirit does for us. His work was far greater than that implied by the familiar definition of comforting—to soothe, to bring tranquil enjoyment. He was like the advocate in Greek and Latin courts, a powerful friend in whose wisdom, knowledge, influence and affection the client had confidence, and who advised, aided, strengthened and comforted him. Barnabas had a great gift by his words, character and personality of comforting others by invigorating them, inspiring them with a new life, strengthening their faith and hope, giving them fresh courage. He was like a fountain of the water of life.

"Comforting," from two Latin words, means making strong together. Nothing is worthy of the name of comfort that is not invigorating, inspiring, filling the soul full of courage and strength.

The Holy Spirit comforted the disciples after the death of Jesus, just as Jesus promised. How? By making the frightened men bold as lions; by changing them into heroes; by giving joy unspeakable when persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, scattered.

There are two sources of danger to the church of Christ.

Dangers from without.

Dangers from within.

The fires of persecution were kindled to consume it. But the church was like the three heroes in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace; the flames did not harm them, and one like the Son of God was with them in the flames. And the light from them caused men to see in clearer light the true God and the Gospel.

It advertised the good news; it scattered the seeds of truth broadcast; it led to more prayer, a stronger faith, a firmer cornage, more generous giving, more fervent preaching; it proved that the piety of the church was no temporary excitement, but a steady burning and shining light.

We now come to a more dangerous attack, from evil within her ranks. Fire cannot consume, nor waters drown the church. There is no way to destroy it but by enemies within.

The engine is powerless if the fires fail. The light goes out when the electric current ceases to flow. We are to study this attack, learn its lessons for to-day, and see how God overruled even this, by victory over evil, for the advancement of the gospel.

V. 5. "Ananias . . . fell down, and gave up the ghost." Literally, "breathed out his life, his soul." In whatever way it came, by the shock of the discovery of his sin, or by a direct stroke from God, it was God's act, and in no sense the act of Peter and the apostles. Very probably they were as much astonished as anyone. Had Peter done this act he would have been a murderer, subject to the law of the land. But he had no hand in it whatever.

Why such severity of punishment? 1. It was deserved, it was justice. "Exact justice is commonly more merciful in the long run than pity."

2. It was necessary in order to save the church from destruction from within.

3. It was necessary to counteract the effect of his conduct upon the world. It would tend to make men believe that there was nothing in religion, that there was no such thing as conversian and true pity. Therefore it was needful that the deed and its spirit should be publicly repudiated in the most remarkable manner, as contrary to the whole teach[illegible] and spirit of religion.

4. Thus it was an act of mercy, not of hatred or revenge.

A few counterfeit Christians do not prove that the gospel is a failure, or the church unworthy. A few dead trees in the forest, or dried stalks in the fields, do not prove that spring is a failure or that the sun does not impart real life.

We must be careful not to measure a man or a society by its imperfections alone.

The punishment of sin is an absolute necessity. Those sins always nourish which can be practiced with impunity, and are lightly regarded.

The Section Opposite.

A Thanksgiving Story By Alice Louise Lee.

Copyright, 1908, by American Press Association.

TEN minutes before the 8:40 train left the Union station Thanksgiving morning a young woman in a dark green suit took possession of the first section in the rear Pullman and proceeded to make herself comfortable.

It was Harriet Stillwell, runaway spinster, known to her Vassar mates—and to a few others—as Harry the Dilatory, because before committing herself to any course she looked at it long and thoroughly from all sides.

"My first celebration of Thanksgiving alone," she confided to her mirror, intending the thought to be a happy one, but instead she found it accompanied by a sigh. This certainly was not logical, and Harriet had prided herself until recently on her logic.

Settling back in her seat, animated by a grim determination to enjoy herself, she turned her attention to the scene outside.

The train, westbound on the Rio Grande road, stood before the Union station in Denver, and the first thing her eyes lighted on was a pair of elk's antlers branching majestically over a load of express trundled across the pavement.

"Oh," she exclaimed aloud, "what beauties!"

She pressed her face against the pane to watch them out of sight. "Ray promised me a pair two years ago, but—well, it's quite like a man to forget!"

But it was not like Ray, and she knew it. Ray had never forgotten a promise to her. She thought of a dozen which he had fulfilled to the letter, but how inconsiderate of memory to choose this of all days wherein to distract her attention when she had been anticipating eagerly her first sight of the Royal gorge! Then she fell to wondering how many guests Ray was having to dinner that day in his bachelor apartments.

In the section opposite the porter was stowing away two suit cases suspiciously new in appearance. Behind him stood the owners, also suspiciously new as to dress. The lady, who was no longer young, wore a suit of gray, a gray hat with a white veil and gray gloves. The man also wore gray—dark gray—from the rim of hair visible beneath his hat to his brand new fashionably cut trousers.

The porter straightened himself, closing his hand over a silver piece with a "Thank you, sah, thank you!" and retired, grinning. Presently the Pullman conductor sauntered in, pulled his mustache and looked knowing, while the passengers gradually awoke to the fact that the wonderful Royal gorge would have a rival in the interests of the day.

As for Harriet, she distinctly disapproved of the open delight which the couple opposite took in their own society, maintaining that ten years of wedded life alone give married people the right to devote themselves to each other in public. "And at the end of ten years they never care to!" thought this runaway spinster, with a glance as scornful as her soft eyes could express. "How glad I am that I have escaped a wedding trip!"

With this Thanksgiving declaration her lips set themselves firmly, but her eyes grew wistful as she fell again into a reverie, going over certain reasons she had gone over so many times before, perfectly logical, but she was not at all sure they satisfied her. That was the trouble, if only she could be sure—

"Sleeper tickets, please!" demanded the conductor.

She produced her ticket, at the same time asking, "Is the upper berth of this section taken, conductor?"

"Yes, ma'am, by a gentleman."

"Ah—thank you." Then the murmur, caught only by the window, "I hope he sees fit to stay in the smoker all day."

But he did not see fit. Half way to Colorado Springs he deserted the smoker and came swinging down the aisle toward his lawful seat in section 1, while Harriet, glancing back, gasped half in dismay, half in delight, wholly astonished.

But he was not looking at her. His eyes were on the couple across the aisle, and a faint smile flashed across his fine face, a smile of sympathy and not derision, she noticed. Then he reached section 1 and removed his hat.

"I beg— Harry Stillwell, by the gods immortal!"

For an instant they looked at each other in silence, Harriet's eyes—before she got them under control—sparkling and dancing over this unexpected meeting.

Then she laughed outright. "Well, Ray, don't you think we better shake hands?"

"Perhaps." He held his out gravely, and to Harriet the knowledge came with a shock of wonder that the face she could read so well was not expressing unalloyed pleasure at sight of her.

"I thought you were at home, Harry," he remarked, resting his elbow on his knee.

"You thought I was at home!" echoed Harriet blankly. "Why, Raymond Merrill! Where have you been all this time?" Her eyes were under control now.

Ray leaned over and rubbed at a spot on the window. "Let's see, I went to North Woods in—August, wasn't it?"

Yes, it was directly after the evening when they had their last talk, such a logical talk—on her part—she considered it. She nodded and allowed a distant view of Pike's Peak to absorb her attention.

"Well, I've not been back since then—scarcely heard from home, in fact." (Then he did not even suspect she was running away from him! She felt unaccountably defrauded.) "I've been all over the west, fishing and hunting. By the way, Harry, I just shipped a pair of elk's antlers back to you from Denver. If you remember, I promised them to you long ago."

She leaned forward eagerly. "Oh, Ray, I do believe I saw them on the platform! They are beauties. Thank you. I can scarcely wait until I get home to have them put up."

Again she was struck by his strange reserve. Three months ago his face would have glowed over her enthusiastic thanks.

The groom's head lay against the back cushions very near his bride's He was speaking low, and she was smiling and pulling at her gray muff.

Quite illogically the sight brought a lump into Harriet's throat. They were silly, of course, to act that way—but—if only Ray would be his old self! Then she strangled the thought and took a fresh hold of herself.

"And you?" Ray was saying.

"Oh, I!" Her tone was lightly flippant. "Why, I've been—since August—rambling too. Can't say I've hunted, but I've fished and ridden and explored from northern Montana to here."

"What for?"

Harriet's chin went up, and her tone became more flippant. "What a queer question! But if you want reasons, fortunately I can control the price of a few railroad tickets. Being past twenty-five and accounted discreet, I can travel alone. I intend to see the west, and I love my independence."

The last assertion escaped her involuntarily. She stopped abruptly and bit her lip. But Ray did not wince. He merely looked at her intently.

"Harry, I believe I can sympathize with you in that independence business. I've been enjoying a taste of independence myself for the first time in seven years."

Harriet looked her amazement. Raymond Merrill was a very model of independence to his friends—independent of family ties, independent in income, in health, in habits. "What do you mean?" she inquired directly.

Ray did not reply at once. He was looking across the aisle again. The bride had bent her face over a book, which she held upside down, while a pair of bearded lips almost against her cheek were whispering. Unexpectedly Ray turned and smiled into Harriet's eyes, with a flash of his old self.

"Disgusting, isn't it?" she said hastily to cover a sudden helpless confusion which sent the blood throbbing into her temples.

"I rather enjoy watching them," returned Ray quietly. "That chap looks as though he expected to attend a perpetual Thanksgiving service, and she—well, it looks as though she was satisfied."

"Watch them on a journey ten years from now and see if she's satisfied," Harriet retorted, furious at herself for giving the conversation such a tactless turn.

"Well, what would you see?" challenged Ray.

"That novel will be right side up"—

"I hope so," coolly. "I should expect a companionship of ten years to rob the situation of some of its novelty."

"And the groom, enveloped in cigar smoke and a newspaper, will occupy the smoker."

"Doubtless. But he may be as sincerely her lover as he is today."

Harriet shrugged her shoulders and gazed back at Colorado Springs, which they were leaving behind them.

"So long as it's Thanksgiving day let's be happy and thankful and not disagree." Her laugh was a trifle forced.

Another bow and another "Just as you choose, Harry."

She moved uneasily, striving in vain to break through the barrier his manner had erected against her. He was perplexing, bewildering.

"Let's go back," she began lightly, although her hands were pressing hard on each other as they lay in her lap. "You said something which makes me curious—that you'd been enjoying your independence for the first time in seven years."

Ray raised his head, with a mirthless smile, and looked at her. Then he hesitated, studying the people in the opposite section. "I never intended to tell you, Harry. It's unfortunate I should meet you just now"—

He stopped. Impulsively Harriet filled in the pause. "I thought you did not appear glad to see me."

"No," he returned frankly, "I was not—am not glad. I remember you always balance your ledger with Providence on Thanksgiving day and count your mercies. This meeting is so far from being among mine that I intend to leave the train at Glenwood Springs this evening—get away from you, in short."

"Why, Raymond Merrill!" The girl's breath was taken away. To run away from Ray, that seemed to have been her duty in August, but to have Ray run away from her, why, it was unthinkable!

"It sounds harsh, I know," the man went on steadily, "but you asked for an explanation and," obstinately, "I intend to make it in all its baldness. But as I don't care to shout it into the face of a car full I'll take the liberty of sitting beside you."

He suited his action to the word, and Harriet's fingers laced themselves together with spasmodic strength as he spoke close to her ear.

"Let's see, Harry. It's just seven years ago today that I gave my first bachelor Thanksgiving dinner, and you were there. Do you remember?"

She nodded mutely.

"From that day to—well, our last talk, I have known no independence of your will. I have served for you faithfully seven years."

Harriet's finger nails pressed into her palms, and her breath came irregularly. He went on:

"It was my study and work to win you, and to that end I ordered my life. You were worth it, Harry, had seven years won you. I have no word of blame for you. I'm not discussing your side of the situation now, but my own."

The girl beside him remembered with a pang of regret.

"I'm merely trying to get at this. Up in the woods last August I determined that my happiness should no longer be dependent on you"—

Ray suddenly broke off and looked at her. Her eyes wavered and fell before his. Down in her throat was a sob she was striving to keep there. For the first time the man's voice softened.

"You'll think it harsh, but I have set out to tell you the whole truth about my new determination. I have thought you the sweetest woman God ever made, but in order to achieve my independence I am unthinking that"—the sob forced itself high in Harriet's throat—"and I fully intend"—

Again he broke off and glanced across the aisle. The bride was looking into her husband's eyes with a face brimming over with love and trust. Ray drew a long breath, and his voice faltered when he spoke again.

"I want a home, not endless bachelor apartments, and love returned as well as given, and when I've achieved my independence I shall seek them—again." He ended abruptly, with a little gesture across the aisle.

"Ray!" The sob broke out with the word. "Ray!" It was a sob which shattered seven years of logic, doubts, questionings, and left her woman's heart pleading for love.

Instantly a big tanned hand lay on the cushion between them, its palm turned up in mute asking, and the next moment it closed over a small one that dropped into it with a quick passionate movement, a very abandonment of giving.

"Sweetheart, I was a long way from achieving my independence," whispered Ray, and the pressure of the fingers within his answered him. Harriet's face, flushed, tear stained, happy, was close against the window.

"Some way it was the sight opposite that gave me courage—not a silly sight, Harry, dear"—

A vehement shake of the head against the window proclaimed her suddenly altered views, and then, despite tears and blushes, she glanced around at the couple across the aisle. The man was answering a chance acquaintance who had come in from another car, and his voice, bluff and merry, was interesting half the occupants of the Pullman.

"Think we're on our wedding tour, do they? Ha, ha!" laughed the man opposite. "That's a good joke. Do you remember—it's exactly ten years ago today that we started on our wedding trip!"

UTILIZATION OF WATER POWER FOR ELECTRIC PURPOSES IN THE COUNTRY.

Brief mention has been made of an enterprise in Washington county which may have a marked effect upon conditions in that section and which suggests what may be done in other rural communities. Some years ago one of the old stone grist mills along Antietam creek was burned, and, although there was a fine water power, the mill was not rebuilt and the dam across the stream was washed away. Recently three citizens of the community, two of them farmers and the other an electrical engineer, bought the mill site, with several dwelling houses, for a small sum and erected an electric power plant. The energy developed by the stream is about 250 horsepower. Two turbine wheels were installed and a large quantity of copper wire was purchased at a low price. The cost of the entire plant, including the wire and the site and the water power, was not much over $15,000, the work of construction being done by the three partners. There was no difficulty in making a contract for lighting the town of Boonsboro, for which the sum of $700 a year is received, and similar contracts with Keedysville and Sharpsburg are said to be almost assured. The cost of running the dynamos is so insignificant that the firm can afford to supply electric lights for the residences and stores in Boonsboro at a rate far below the usual price, and it is reported that many orders for lights are being received.

It has also been suggested that the owners of this electric plant will be able to supply lights and motors to the barns and farmhouses of the vicinity. Every farm needs a motor for pumping water. At the present time this work is done by windmills. But the first cost of a wind wheel and tower is considerable and the cost of maintaining them is also large. There are many other uses to which a motor can be put on a farm. Nor is the matter of electric lights in barns and stables an unimportant consideration. It will be recalled that the great fire in Chicago was caused by a cow kicking a lantern over in the stable bedding. That thing is liable to happen in any stable Lanterns are used at milking time in the winter both morning and evening, and doubtless much property is destroyed by them. Moreover, when the farmer comes home with his team on a winter evening it would be a great comfort to be able to light his stable by touching a button.

All through the uplands of Maryland there is enormous water power going to waste. If the various streams could be harnessed so as to run neighborhood electric plants, which would supply cheap light and power to the community, it would work a great change and improvement in the State. As farm labor becomes more expensive and more difficult to secure the electric motor would come more and more into use to take the place of laborers. And as the science of electricity becomes better understood the waterfalls may supply the homes with heat and thus help to conserve the coal supply for a while longer.

THE PRESIDENT'S PLANS FOR THE FUTURE.

It leaks out through various channels that at the dinner of the New York delegation the other evening President Roosevelt delivered one of the most interesting speeches he has made in years. He talked about his own ideas of the future of an ex-President—of one ex-President at least.

The President assured his hearers that he is going, in the first place, to take care of himself, to earn a living, and to continue a citizen deeply interested in the course of public affairs, and determined to forward his views of them by every political and other means possible. He will write and speak and take part in the regular procedure of politics. He asks no favors and no odds. He will go back to his home on Long Island and associate himself with the other men in the ranks of the State's politics. He doesn't want any especial consideration because of what he has been or has done. He simply wants to take his place like any other man, to do his share, and be allowed the privilege of doing and thinking and fighting for what he believes to be the right thing.

The President's announcement, together with a very effective discussion of his ideals of public service, was cheered repeatedly. It cannot be said that there is much in it to occasion surprise. It would be impossible for a man with his temperament and his experience to retire suddenly from an active part in affairs. None the less, it is certain to arouse the liveliest interest to have the President's own assurance that neither literature nor anything else is to lead him away from the activities of a very direct relation to public affairs. He will be a unique figure. Few Presidents have attempted after retirement to be more than political sages, counselors of friends and intimates, and at times of the body of people; but the rule has been dignified retirement. Retirement isn't the thing Mr. Roosevelt likes. He wants activity, and he will undoubtedly get it. He will also afford an ample allowance of it to some other people.

NEW GOOD ROADS IDEA.

In view of the fact that Maryland is about to begin the expenditure of $5,000,000 on the building and improvement of its highways it would be well to look into the suggestion made by D. Ward King in a recent address to a gathering of good roads enthusiasts in Pittsburg in which he pointed out a simple and inexpensive method of improving highways where it is inexpedient to give them a macadam surface.

Mr. King's scheme has the indorsement not only of the Automobile Club of America, but of state and federal authorities, and the value of his suggestions is emphasized by the fact that his advocacy of good roads is dictated by no selfish motive. He is doing missionary work and the results are already apparent in different parts of the country. The device of Mr. King's invention can be made by any person in a short time. It is a simple form of drag which soon puts the worst road into fair condition. Although the greatest benefit from good roads accrues to the farmer, the Automobile Club of America offers to pay to every person who constructs a King road drag and uses it once, the sum of $5, which more than covers its cost. The idea is that once the advantages of the device have been demonstrated, it will be kept in use.

The Pittsburg Gazette-Times, speaking in favor of Mr. King's plan, says:

In Allegheny county, it is stated, out of 1,700 miles of public roads, but 300 miles are improved. Some day, it is hoped, all these roads will be macadam, but it is too long to wait. In the meantime any plan for making present roads passable and so shaped as to shed water readily, will be heartily welcomed.

Automobilists are already taking an important part in the movement for good roads and they deserve substantial support. America has admittedly been backward in this respect, but it should be remembered that, unlike England and France, we have not been able to profit by the example of the ancient road-builders. The stretches of road are also greater than in other countries. It is encouraging to learn that Mr. King has made many converts to his theory in this vicinity and that the practical plan he suggests will soon be put into extensive operation. A scheme that has proved so advantageous elsewhere should be equally effective in Western Pennsylvania.

CONSERVATION.

The petty squabbles over matters of small consequences, in which reactionaries in the house and senate have sought to discredit the Roosevelt administration, will soon pass out of men's minds. The names of some of the statesmen prominent in those squabbles will soon appear on the list of obscure politicians out of a job, but the great movement for the conservation of our national resources inaugurated by the President is destined to become one of the significant incidents of our national history.

The program of constructive legislation suggested by the report of the conservation commission and hinted at rather than outlined in President Roosevelt's latest message is almost bewilderingly vast and far-reaching in it scope. No nation in all the world's history has ever gone consciously to work at the task of conserving and developing its natural resources on any such comprehensive plan. There have been many striking incidents in the public career of Theodore Roosevelt, the strenuous President, but it is likely that his fame will live in history as the originator of this systematic movement for national conservation.

February 12 Legal Holiday.

Governor Crothers has issued a proclamation declaring Friday, February 12, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Lincoln, a legal holiday in Maryland. The proclamation was issued says the Governor, at the request of a large number of prominent citizens of the state.

Teachers' Institute for Selbysport.

The following program has been prepared under the direction of Garrett County Teachers' Association for a local teachers' institute to be held at Selbysport on Saturday, February 6th, 1909, in the school building at that town.

Address of welcome, N. R. Selby; response, L. F. Green. The subjects following will be discussed: Tardiness and Co-Operation; Arithmetic, including the mental branches; English and Literature, Orthography, in which all teachers present will be expected to participate. A literary program will be rendered by the school on Friday evening preceding the institute which will be followed by an address to be delivered by Supt. E. A. Browning.

TIPPLERS MUST POSSESS LICENSE TO BUY A DRINK

Singular "Local Option" Measure Before the Washington Legislature.

Liquor drinkers in the State of Washington will be forced to carry licenses. embelished with their photograph and other data of identification and any one will be permitted to engage in the traffic without the payment of fees, if the measure framed by Elmer E. Hall, of Spokane, and fathered by State Senator Whitney of Spokane county, is adopted by the legislature, now in session at Olympia. The purpose is to revolutionize the existing saloon system and settle the liquor question.

Licenses to drink anything stronger than ginger, pop and the various other "stickless" concoctions, will cost $5 a year. There is no sliding scale. The ragged individual with a battered dime and a camel's neck thirst will then occupy the same status as a sudden made millionaire with a fondness for the crystal bubbles rising on the juice of the grape. The licenses will be non-transferable and will permit the holder to buy drinks only from dispensers in the county where the permit is issued.

With the view to encouraging temperance it is provided also that the penalty upon conviction for intoxication shall be forfeiture of the license for a period ranging from 30 to 60 days, at the discretion of the trial judge, and that the license shall be declared permanently forfeited upon the second conviction. Similar penalties are provided for selling liquor to any one not possessing a permit or to intoxicated persons with permits.

Senator Whitney says there is a strong sentiment in favor of such law; "and" he adds, "there is a chance for its passage during the present session if the local option fight does not crowd it off the calendar."

JENNINGS.

Snow and wind is the order of the day.

Miss Susie Pritts, of Meadow Mountain, is spending a couple of weeks with her brother at this place.

Miss Ruth Stark spent the past week with Mrs. H. G Custer.

Mr. Warner Dill is in Pittsburg on business.

Mrs. A. K. Reid, Misses Mary Laffey and Ruth Fleck were calling on Miss Zinna Stark Wednesday evening.

Misses Nancy Shaw and Amelia Stark were visiting relatives in Boynton several days last week.

Miss Lucretia Wiley and Frank Stephen were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Keif Thursday.

The "Ocean Wave," on Railroad street, is doing a rushing business at present.

Mr. Floyd Stark fell off a lumber pile one day last week and sprained his ankle very badly.

Singing is progressing nicely under the management of Prof. Bittinger.

Jennings Bros. have completed their engine house here.

Mr. Ed. Swanger recently bought the J. L. Durst mine. He is very busy delivering coal.

Mrs. Chas. Ross is on the sick list.

The school here is doing excellent work under the management of Mr. Bittinger and Miss Laffey.

Mrs. Chas. Swauger and son, of New Germany, were in town on business Monday.

Mr. Truman Durst was calling on Miss Zinna Stark Sunday.

Master Albert Wiley, who has been very ill for the past month, is slowly improving.

ALL WEARING FUR

DOMINANT NOTE OF FASHIONABLE MILLINERY.

Fur Toques and Hats with Fur Crowns Are Both in Order—One Type of Ornament That Is Much Used.

Fur toques and wider hats with fur crowns reign supreme among fashionable millinery for street wear. The woman who does not possess one of these smart lynx, chinchilla, mink or sable confections should count herself out of the running, and if she does not wear her large flat fur toque placed well down over her head, with a perceptible backward tilt to its broad rolling brim, then she is not following the dictates of Parisian milliners, who design their turbans and flat round hats now to be thus adjusted. With the fashionable low coiffure worn during the daytime this tilt can be managed quite easily. The sides of the hair are pulled out a little to fill in this part of the brim.

As to trimming, only one thing, or one type of ornament, is permissible, and that is a jaunty quill or upstanding feather which is in itself soft and fluffy, but which assumes an aggressive air, due to the backbone supplied by the milliner's art. With these jaunty and sensible hats a fur scarf of medium length is the correct neck decoration to wear, and always the hat and scarf, the hat and muff or the scarf and muff are made of the same kind of fur. Ribbon rosettes or a fancy buckle is the only bright touch given to the fur hat, and one sees all black effects quite as often as contrasting ones.

NEWEST THING IN PERFUMES.

American Beauty Sachet Has Caught Fancy of Fashion.

Each year sees a new fashion in perfume. The winter of 1909 will give to the American Beauty the apple of success.

This is the new perfume, and the ultra-fashionable thing of the day is to have it in sachet or a drop of it for your clothes or a cake of soap to use on special occasions.

The Americans have taken it up not only with patriotism but enthusiasm. Heretofore they have always used the French perfumes under French names.

The sachets of this sell from 75 cents up and are confined in an envelope of American Beauty satin. The odor is subtle and lasting.

Only a small bottle of the essence is needed, as a drop is enough for a gown. The smart women put a drop or two on a piece of gauze or cotton and tuck it away in the evening gown.

One drop of it put on a blouse perfumes it as though it had been put away in a pot-pourri of American Beauty rose leaves.

Directoire Neck Ruches.

Directoire frills falling over the tops of the high, close collars have prepared us for the directoire neck ruches of this autumn, and indeed the last spring and summer saw a few of these same models in ruches, though they were but little worn on this side of the ocean.

The most striking characteristics of these novelties are their height and the closeness with which they clasp the throat. That they will not be generally becoming is a foregone conclusion, but women will ignore that fact in their pursuit of the new and the chic, and the shapes which are now being shown in neck ruches on collars for early autumn wear will find echoes in the fur collars of the later season.

Don't Use Pins.

Girls, if you wish to be dainty about your fancy work, discard pins, which invariably leave an imprint in delicate fabrics, and use instead wax tipped needles. Such needles cannot be bought, but are quickly made at home by dipping the eye ends of fine needles in melted wax, thus giving them tiny heads. As an evening pastime dozens can be prepared in this way, using one color or different colors of wax if the maker likes artistic variety. The girl who once uses these dainty needles for pinning her fine work will never be willing to resort to ordinary pins.

Feathers in Hat Crowns.

One of the popular devices for trimming large hats now is to use four extra thick short plumes. The stems of these are well cut off and the feathers are mounted in the center of the crown.

They fall to the brim in an immense cascade quite covering the crown There is no other trimming on the hat

Gen. Crook's Captor Dead.

David S. Powell died at Higginsville, Hampshire county, W. Va., Wednesday, from a cancer of the stomach, aged 72 years. He leaves a son, three daughters, two brothers, and two sisters. He served in Rosser's brigade during the civil war and was a member of the small party of Confederates who went from Hampshire county through Federal lines into Cumberland, then occupied by Federal troops, captured Gens. Crook and Kelley, and made their escape again through the Federal lines. History records it as one of the most daring exploits of the war.

BITTINGER.

It is said that February has the distinction that in it "women talk less than in any other month," and it is well that in February men should consider this bit of philosophy: "Think twice before you speak once, and even then, nine times out of ten, the world won't miss much if you keep quiet."

The first visitation we may expect is the "ground hog" with his usual blizzard.

During the closing days of January, the most severe blizzard of the winter swept over this section of the county.

Benjamin Schrock, fireman on Messrs. Manassa and Lloyd Brenneman's saw mill at this place, had his leg badly cut one day last week by coming in contact with a revolving buzz saw.

Jacob Brenneman is confined to his home by an attack of the grippe.

Miss Lizzie Orendorf, of the Duckworth school, spent Saturday, Sunday and Monday with her parents at this place.

Mrs. John Hoover, who resides near Jennings, has been seriously ill for several days, but is reported to be improving.

News reached this village last Monday afternoon of the death of Noah Broadwater, a life long resident and well known merchant of Grantsville. His death occurred at Pittsburg about noon on Monday.

J. Turner Lohr went to Baltimore last week, where we learn he will take treatment for an affection of the auditory organs.

A lodge of the Fraternal Order of Eagles was instituted at Blaine and it will be known as Kitzmiller Aerie, named for the mining town of Kitzmiller, in Garrett county, opposite Blaine. The aerie starts with 84 members. About 250 persons participated in the banquet. Roast suckling pig was on the menu. Visitors were present from Baltimore, Oakland and other points.

Mr. Wesley Durst, of Sutton, was in the city on business Tuesday.

Mr. James M. Litzinger, of Grafton, spent yesterday in Oakland on business.

'Squire David W. Fraker, of near McHenry, was among the visitors to Oakland Tueeday.

Mr. Dennis Brenneman, of near Bittinger, was in Oakland Monday when he called at this office.

Capt. Robert H. Gordon, of Cumberland, was in Oakland Tuesday on business.

Mrs. E. Fundenburg and daughter, of Deer Park, were in Oakland shopping Tuesday afternoon.

Mrs. Leah F. Sincell, who spent two weeks with her children in Oakland, returned to Keyser Tuesday afternoon.

Mrs. Oscar Hinebaugh, of Terra Alta, is here for a few days' visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. James O. Cleveland.

Mr. Matthias Barker, one of Swanton's good citizens, was a caller at THE REPUBLICAN office Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Sliger entertained a number of their friends at their residence on Second street Monday night.

Messrs. S. F. Hamill and T. A. Gonder, of the Hamill Lumber Co., Etam, W. Va., spent Sunday and Monday in Oakland.

Mrs. John A. Grant, who spent a week or two at her former home near Winchester, Va., returned to Oakland last Thursday evening.

Mrs. Eva Mitchell, who spent a week with friends in Cumberland and Lonaconing, returned to her home in Oakland Monday evening.

Mrs. W. L. Thomas, who was on a two weeks' visit to her parents near Tunnelton, returned to her home in Oakland Tuesday.

Miss Kate Shirer, of Grafton, W. Va., who visited her parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Shirer, in Oakland for a week, returned to Grafton Monday.

Miss Effie Cuppett returned yesterday to her home at Mt. Lake Park, after spending several days here with relatives and friends.—Grafton Republican.

Messrs. L. H. Friend and H. C. Hershman, of Swanton, were callers at this office yesterday afternoon. Mr. Hershman is the recently appointed road supervisor for District No. 1 and was in Oakland for the purpose of qualifying as such before the County Commissioners.

The furniture and fixtures of the Browning restaurant, located in the Litzinger building on Second street, which was closed some weeks ago on an attachment for rent, were sold yesterday at public auction by Constable Maffett. A sum amounting to less than the rental due was realized by the sale.

Arrangements have been completed by the ladies of the Oakland Presbyterian church for a church fair and supper to be held in the basement of the Lutheran church on the night of the 18th inst. when excellent suppers will be served and fancy and useful articles will be on sale.

Dr. and Mrs. B. F. Selby and little daughter, who were on a visit to friends and relatives in Philadelphia and Howard county, Md., returned to their home in Oakland last Thursday night.

Mr. M. R. Hamill, assistant cashier of the First National Bank, who was confined to his home several days last week with an attack of the grip, has recovered and resumed his position in the bank Monday.

Mr. Harvey Cuppett, of Mt. Lake Park, spent a few hours in the city yesterday with his brother, Mr. A. V. Cuppett, en route to Fairmont to attend to business of importance.—Grafton Republican.

Mr. Leonard Lochner, who went to Wheeling several weeks ago to recuperate his health, returned to Oakland last Thursday and resumed his position as foreman of THE REPUBLICAN job printing department.

Mr. Ulysses S Frazee, of near Selbysport, was in the city Tuesday on business before the Orphans' Court, having accompanied Mrs. Jasper Frazee here who was appointed administrator of the estate of her recently deceased husband.

Miss Sadie Laughlin of Deer Park, Md., who has been in the city visiting her brother, Mr. H. R. Laughlin, departed today for Pennsboro where she will spend some time with her brother, Mr. Add Laughlin.—Grafton Republican.

Mr. Gustav Goehringer, of Accident, was in Oakland Tuesday and had printed at this office posters announcing the sale of all his personal property, to take place at his farm near Accident on the 16th inst. After the sale Mr. Goehringer will move from his native county to Dorchester county, Md., where he will engage in truck farming.

The Postoffice Department at Washington announces that shortly before February 12 next, the one hundreth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, the postoffices will be furnished by the department with a limited supply of 2-cent stamps of special design commemorative of that event. The stamp will be red and of the size and shape of the regular issue of postage stamps and will show a profile of the head of Lincoln from the Saint Gauden's statue.

Reports from District No. 2 indicate that from one to half a dozen candidates will be in the field for the nominations to be made during the next six or seven months by the Republican party. From what is considered reliable authority there will be at least three candidates for the State Senate and an equal number for the House. The Sheriffalty bee is buzzing in half a dozen bonnets and the candidates for County Commissioner surpasse s counting. The field is a wide one, the honors are small, the pay less, but may the best men win.

GROUND HOG WAS ON DECK.

Winter Wea ther For Weeks to Come The Prediction.

Tuesday was the second day of February, the day on which it is given the dwellers of the earth to know whether the thermometer will remain stationary for a season or whether the mercury therein will ascend or descend.

That is the day on which Mr. Groundhog shines and the sun also—sometimes—most always. The groundhog come out, as is customary for him to do, on that day from his home below the sod and it was hoped that he would be frightened by the heavy banks of snow and the general appearance of the world before Old Sol's rays would enable him to discern the faint outlines of his own little carcass shadowed upon the snow, but Old Sol also arose early—no preliminaries about him that morning, for he burst forth with glorious scintillations and flooded the world with sunshine on schedule time and he kept on shining throughout the entire day, only fading from sight at his usual time for retiring, leaving the world bathed in a mellow light reflected upon the snow covered earth from a pink and gold sky in the west.

As a result of the combined visit of Old Sol and Mr. Groundhog on Tuesday the people of the world will be expected to battle with the elements for a season of six weeks—but, say, this has been a season of "all signs failing," and we trust they will continue to fail.

Mr. R. E. Sliger, the Master-elect of Oakland Lodge of Masons, was in Cumberland last Friday night where the Master's degree was conferred upon him at a special communication of a Past Masters' lodge held there that evening. His Honor Judge Robert R. Henderson was the speaker of the evening and made an address to the assembled brethern of the ancient Craft.

Rev. and Mrs. L. B Hensley and little daughter, who spent several weeks at the home of Mrs. Hensley at Beverly, W. Va., returned to Oakland last Thursday night and on Sunday Mr. Hensley preached to his congregation here. Mr. Hensly's enforced vacation owing to his declining health, did him much good and his return to his field of labor better equipped physically is gratifying to his many friends and admirers.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Susannah Ward, nee Shirer, took place from the residence of her brother, Mr. G. A. Shirer, on Oak street last Friday afternoon, the services being conducted by Rev. E. Manges, of the Lutheran church, of which Mrs. Ward was a member for many years, assisted by Rev. J. B. Workman, of the M. E. church. The pall bearers were Messrs. J. M. Jarboe, James W. White, D. M. Mason, Geo. M. Mason, D. M. Dixon and G. W. Legge. The funeral was largely attended by the friends and relatives of the deceased lady, and interment was made in the Oakland cemetery

Ex-Judge of the Orphans' Court George B. McMillan, of near Lonaconing, was in Oakland Tuesday where he appeared before the County Commissioners on business. Mr. McMillan is taking a rosy view of the coal mining interests of this and Allegany county. While business in the coal line is exceedingly flat now he predicts a resumption of work all along the line within the next month or two. The many miners who left the George's Creek region during the past two or three months, going to other fields for work, have all returned to their former homes, conditions being so unlike the Allegany county mines that they could not "make both ends meet."

Marriage Licenses.

In last week's report of the licenses issued by Clerk Tower it was stated that one had been issued to Milton O. Friend and Icie Friend, whereas it should have read Ellis Eriend and Icie Friend. Milton O. Friend applied for the license.

Licenses issued this week are as follows:

Felix Earle Currence, of Grafton, and Lillie Margaret Gatrell, of Mill Creek, W. Va.

Harvey Creigh Hagendorn and Daisy Eaglen, both of Dellslow, W. Va.

William Franklin Calvert and Bonnie Maude Cunningham, of Clarksburg.

William Alexander Chisholm, of Oakland, and Lillian Olivett Browning, of Deer Park.

Robert Leo Warnick and Beatrice Veronica Morrison, of Weston, W. Va.

Brooks Ohley Bartholow, of Salem, W. Va., and Mabel C. Madden, of Fairmont, W. Va.

Four with request not to publish.

Livery Removed.

Messrs. Maroney Bros., the Quality Hill liverymen, have removed from their old location to the Helbig barn which was recently vacated by Mr J. A. Kelly. The equipment of the Maroney Bros. stable compares very favorably with that of other liverymen and they aim to please their patrons.

$25 Reward.

I will give twenty-five dollars reward to any person for the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who on the night of Jan. 16, 1909, unlocked and entered my corn-crib, and took out and carried away several bushels of corn.

DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARY A. ENGLE

Died, suddenly of apoplexy, at her home at Deer Park, on January 31st, at 1:45 a. m., Mrs. Mary Engle, wife of Walter Engle and twin sister of Wm. D. Hoye, and also a sister of Miss E. J. Hoye and Mrs. L. D. Thrasher, of Deer Park, and aunt of Mrs. John Felty and Miss Nellie Hoye, of Oakland, and Mrs. W. C. Dunnington, of Mountain Lake Park. The funeral took Wednesday at 1:30 p. m., Rev. Bolton and Dr. Lee, of Mountain Lake Park, officiating. Obituary next week.

MRS. EMMA ROSE WARNICK.

Mrs. Emma Rose Warnick, wife of Gilbert Warnick, died on January 27th, of tuberculosis, aged 34 years, at her home in Bloomington. Her remains were buried in the Bloomington cemetery on Saturday, the 29th, after services in the M. E. church, conducted by Rev. Creek. She is survived by her husband and five children.

MRS. BERTHA UPHOLD.

Mrs. Bertha Uphold, wife of Jasper Uphold, of Skipnish, died after a short illness on December 24th. She was born Oct. 17, 1886, at Deep Creek, Md., and married June 11, 1907. She was 22 years, 2 months and 7 days old. Her maiden name was Bertha Roy. Her husband and one child Francis, 9 months old, survive and mourn her loss, but this consolation we have, she had made her peace with her God and died in happiness being both willing and ready to go home. The remains were laid in the Browning cemetery near the Harington school house. A FRIEND.

NOAH BROADWATER.

Noah Broadwater, a prominent merchant of Grantsville, died Monday about noon in the Allegheny General Hospital, Pittsburg, Pa., where he had been under treatment for several days for a general breakdown in his health. Mr. Broadwater was fifty-five years of age. He is survived by four children, all of whom are grown. His wife died several years ago. For many years Mr. Broadwater conducted a large general store at Grantsville where he was prominent in the affairs of the town. His remains were taken from Pittsburg to Grantsville Monday afternoon, and the funeral services were conducted there yesterday.

Married.

CHISHOLM—BROWNING—At the residence of the officiating minister, Rev. J. E. Connell, of the Catholic church, Oakland, on Monday, February 1st, Miss Lillian Olivett Browning, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey Browning, of Deer Park and Mr. William Alexander Chisholm, son of Mr. John H. Chisholm, of near Swallow Falls. The bride is one of Garrett county's best young ladies and for some time has been connected with the public schools of the county as a teacher. Mr. Chisholm, the groom, is a soldier in the regular army and for several years has been stationed in Cuba with his regiment. With the evacuation of the Island by United States forces a few weeks ago, Mr. Chisholm's regiment was brought home and sent to Cheyenne, Wyoming, where he expects to join his command next week. The bride will remain at her home near Deer Park until Mr. Chisholm's term of enlistment expires.

WILSON—BUZZELL—At Elkins, W. Va., Wednesday, January 27th, 1909, Mr. Marshall Ney Wilson, vice president of the First National Bank, of Oakland, and Miss Alice Mabel Buzzell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Buzzell, of Elkins, W. Va. The couple left immediately after the ceremony for a bridal tour through the South and will return to Elkins prior to March 15th, after which date they will be at home, 201 Davis street. Mr. Wilson is a son of the late George W. Wilson, of District No. 8, and is a prosperous saw mill operator. The bride is one of Elkin's fairest young ladies.

City Minstrels.

Towers' Big City Minstrels will make their initial bow to the public on the night of February 22nd, when a minstrel program will be rendered. Jingling Jeems Bell is general manager of the aggregation as well as advertising manager and advance agent. He will also appear on the stage as a star actor—in fact, may become the whole show. To see Jingling Jeems once means that you will go a second time. As the show is for the benefit of the Mountain City Band we bespeak for it a packed house and an appreciative audience. Further announcements will be made concerning the show in later issues of this paper.

When His Memory Failed

By H. Tipton Steck.

(Copyright, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"Did you get me those new socks today, Mabel?" grunted Jones, as he scraped the last bit of lather from his smarting countenance, hastily applied a cooling lotion, and removed his slippers.

"Oh, pshaw! I forgot them, dear. Really, I had so many things to get, and so little time that I—"

"Forgot them! That's it! Always when I am concerned, you forget. I'll feel very comfortable at the show tonight, won't I?" and Jones scowled at the darned socks on either foot.

"I'm very sorry, dear," replied his wife from the next room.

"Lot of good that does. It's a funny thing you can always remember a new hat, new gloves, new shoes—something for yourself—and then when I want some socks, I can either get them myself or go without. You want to go to the show to-night so bad—what if I had forgotten to procure tickets, eh? What if I forgot any of the hundred things you are eternally clamoring for? I would get a nice jawing, and be sarcastically complimented on having sawdust for brains. Then, when I want a simple pair of socks—rubbish!"

How Jones managed to dress that evening for the opera has been a source of puzzle to him ever since. That measly little shirt-button persisted in hiding under various pieces of furniture, until his supply of choice profanity was exhausted, and his temper a raging volcano. He couldn't find his cuff-links; a ten-minute search brought to light one collar fairly tidy, and his tie stubbornly refused to form itself into a neat bow, until wifey—summoned by a clarion call—came to his rescue.

Altogether, it was a very hot and wrathy Jones, who, dabbing a bit of cologne about his person, surveyed himself in the glass, and demanded to know if Mrs. Jones would take all evening to get ready.

"In a moment, dear. Don't forget the tickets."

"You needn't give yourself any concern on that score whatever," reaching for a cigar and glancing at the pasteboards and roll of bills lying on the dresser. "My memory is not in the least affected," with distinct emphasis on the possessive pronoun.

He Clutched Wildly for His Bank Roll.

Mrs. Jones quickly noticed the insinuation, but wisely held her peace. She knew him well—better than he knew himself—and on several occasions his mental lapses had produced complications embarrassing in the extreme, but his capacity for self-admiration was limitless. Therefore, after a hasty dab of powder, she quietly pronounced her readiness, and Jones snapped off the lights.

The theater reached, his ruffled temper was again aggravated by a seedy fellow who was trying to force his way through the jam, and who seemed to take particular pains to crowd poor Jones. Jones lost no time in telling him his opinion of public nuisances in general, but the rude one advised him to "hire a hall," and promptly disappeared in the crush, at which he swore softly, and felt for the tickets.

They were gone!

He clutched wildly for his bankroll.

Gone!

With horrible thoughts of pickpockets chasing rampant through his disordered brain, he hurried Mrs. Jones into a near-by drug store, gasped out his troubles, cautioned her to wait for him—he would soon find the wretch—and regained the street, his head in a whirl.

Here was a nice mess. Four dollars' worth of tickets and 15 other cold plunks lifted from his person with an ease that was positively uncanny. He could see it all now; the seedy-looking fellow, the intentional crowding, and, to crown it all, the monumental gall displayed in advising him—John Waltham Jones—to do such a vulgar thing as "hire a hall;" the very thought of which brought his blood again to the boiling point.

The odor of rank cooking, together with a strange feeling of uneasiness, caused him to glance up hastily. He was in front of a dingy restaurant—one of those alluring places whose chief source of income depends on the sale of "sinkers and coffee."

But what forced an irrepressible cry of joy from his lips was a sight of the lone customer perched on one of the stools at the counter, contentedly munching away on a huge bun clutched in his left hand, while the right vigorously stirred a cup of steaming "bootlegs," and who, but a short time before, had so handily relieved him of tickets and bank roll.

Controlling a desire to haul the thief from his meal and administer a sound drubbing, Jones raced to the corner, found an officer, and excitedly told his story.

"And yez say he's in Foley's place blowin' himself to a feed?" questioned the guardian of the peace, looking suspiciously at the immaculate figure before him.

"Yes, in that little restaurant down there. We can nab him with the goods, if we hurry."

Jones was eloquent in his appeal, as the thought of the fellow stuffing himself at his (Jones') expense, was gall and wormwood.

The patrolman, convinced that things were all right, acted quickly; Foley's was invaded, and the prisoner, protesting his innocence at every step, was hustled off to the station.

Jones went over his story again to the sergeant, dilating on the details until the outlook was indeed black for the unfortunate, who had given the name of Marshall. A thorough search, however, failed to bring forth either tickets or money, and Jones was furious.

"Sergeant," he stormed, "he's had a confederate near by, and—"

"Yer another!" broke in Marshall. "I never lifted yer wad, an' you know it. Just such fresh guys—"

"Silence!" exclaimed the sergeant. "Lock him up, officer." Then to Jones: "Be on hand in the morning to appear."

He promised and left the station.

"You bet I'll appear against him," Jones was saying later to his wife, as he snapped on the electrics. "Why not?"

"Oh, it's such a bother, and, besides, are you positive he took them?"

"Positive! Certainly I'm positive! Where else could they have gone to?"

"Well, you might have forgotten them, or else—"

"Rubbish!" snorted Jones, and disappeared into his room.

A rather lurid exclamation caused her to follow.

He was standing in the middle of the floor, gazing idiotically at the dresser.

On it—just where he had left them—lay the missing tickets and roll of bills!

Was it any wonder that Mrs. Jones swept majestically from the room, and banged the door after her?

THE DANCE IN MONTANA.

Description of Scene of Joy Makes One Long to Have Been There.

There was sure something doing at the Silver Tip schoolhouse Saturday night. At eight o'clock the building was dark and gloomy and the floor was covered with everything from chalk to pieces of sage brush and coal, but behold the transformation which had taken place in less than an hour.

Three men with brooms swept the floor; then for good measure the women swept it again. Somebody brought a stove; some one else arranged boards for seats. Still another sprinkled wax on the floor about an inch deep, and then the music started; also the fun. Twenty-five couples were on the floor at ten o'clock. They were still there dancing like mad until midnight—and then some.

A boiler of coffee was made. No one knows who made it, but we will let that pass. Of course, one thoughtful person drove a cow up to the door, so there was plenty of milk. A peck measure contained sugar, and for spoons you could take your choice of using your finger or shaking the contents of the tin cup around until the ingredients were well mixed.

And then those ham sandwiches! Tied up in tissue paper with red ribbons. Some were so hungry after the strenuous hours of the early evening that they ate the sandwiches without removing either the ribbon or paper.

But the dance went on. Was there ever such a time before? Old-fashioned quadrilles were mixed in with waltzes and two-steps, and for good measure jigs were thrown in. The old schoolhouse may have seen its best days as far as "learning" is concerned, but it is a pretty good dance hall in a pinch right now.

Tune up the fiddle; put more rosin on the bow and let her go. Wow!—Carbon County News.

New Deity in Africa.

Ekokombi, calling himself a deity, has appeared among the Congolese of the Mongo and Ngombe and created great excitement. He has issued a command that all charms and fetishes be destroyed or otherwise got rid of, and if in his course any are found still in possession of these they will be tortured or killed by some of his messengers. This has taken such a hold on the minds of the people all over the interior that strong as is their belief in the potency of their charms, they have in most cases destroyed them.

Electricity in Japan.

The authorized capital of Japanese electric undertakings in 1903, $14,193,000, rose to $68,724,000 in 1907. The electrical works undertaken chiefly represented lighting and railways. The number of lights supplied in 1903, 265,000, increased in 1907 to 859,143. Tokyo and Osaka require each 100,000 lights. Electric railways show equal development. In 1903 the mileage was 38, which rose to 119 in 1907, and will be largely added to by construction during the present year.

THE ELECTRICAL WORLD

ELECTRIC CHAFING DISH.

How the Heat Is Produced in the Vessel.

Whenever electricity is flowing through a wire the temperature of that wire is raised above the surrounding atmosphere. The amount of heat developed depends upon the nature of the conducting wire and its size. It is a fact that every path through which electricity flows offers some obstruction to the flow. This quality is known as resistance, and the resistance of a difinite length of wire of a given diamater of any material can readily be measured. It is expressed in units called "ohms" after the German scientist, Dr. George F. Ohm, who discovered this law of electrical flow. An "ohm" is the equivalent to the resistance of 251 feet of copper wire about the size of a wire hairpin. A steel wire of the same size and length would have a resistance of about seven "ohms."

The heat developed in any conductor with a given amount of current flowing through it depends upon this "resistance." If one part of the circuit has a higher resistance than another the most heat will be generated there. If in a circuit of large low-resistance copper wire a small piece of fine wire or platinum wire, each having a very high resistance, is introduced, a current which will barely warm the copper wire will heat the iron or platinum wire white hot. This arrangement is used for exploding mines and blasts or submarine torpedoes.

Heat is developed everywhere in the circuit by the flow of electricity. If the circuit is broken a bright spark is noticed. This is causedby the sudden heating of the last particles of metal and possibly to the heating of an infinitesimal puff of metallic vapor formed by the volatilization of the metal.

Upon this very principle all the electric heating devices of to-day are constructed.

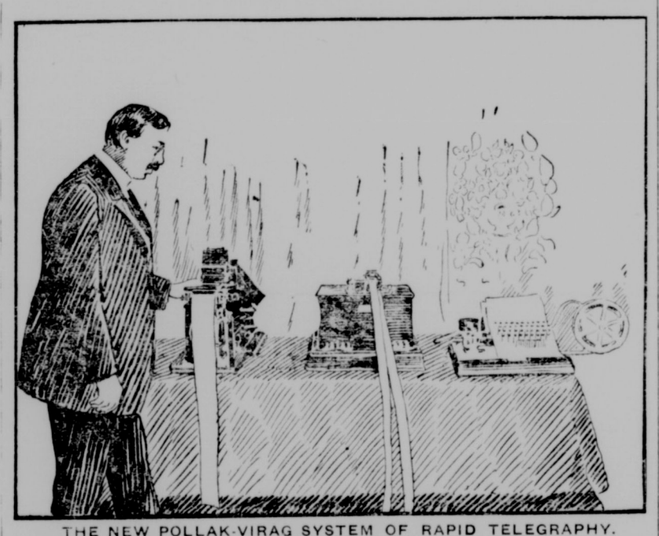
Take for instance the electric chafing dish. Without the above explanation it is difficult for the layman to understand where the heat comes from which cooks the fudge or the welsh-rarebit. One can see no flame, nothing that even looks as though it might be hot, yet the contents of the pan are bubbling away, emitting clouds of steam.

When the flexible cord is connected to the electric light socket and the current turned on the electricity flows down the wires in the cord to the "resistance" coil concealed in the bottom of the chafing dish. This "resistance" usually of German silver wire does not allow the current to pass readily, causing the wire to get quite hot. The device is supplied with two heats, meaning that the amount of current flowing through the resistance can be increased thereby making the pan hotter. The "heating unit" in the chafing dish is entirely concealed and there is not the slightest danger of setting fire to anything when the utensil is in operation.

THE NEW TELEGRAPHY

Instrument Which Will Transmit Forty-Five Words Per Hour.

In telegraphy, next to certainty of communication, the most important thing is speed of telegraphing; and it is in this particular that for the present the advantage rests incomparably with wire-transmitted rather than with wireless messages. Mr. Antal Pollak, at the meeting which was held at the Royal Colonial Institute to further the alluring prospect of penny cablegrams, gave an exhibition of the Pollak-Virag system, of which he is part inventor, and which was once said to be capable of transmitting as many as 100,000 words an hour. That was the usual over-estimate, though in practice 45,000 words an hour have been sent between Berlin and Konigsberg over a distance of nearly 500 miles. The great feature of the Pollak-Virag system is that the message when received writes itself in characters which resemble those of handwriting. The message is sent on an ordinary Wheatstone transmitter, by first punching out a strip of paper with the perforations which represent the letters. This strip is then run through the transmitter, and its symbols are reproduced electrically at the other end of the line. Those who have seen an ordinary wheatstone message know that at the receiving end of the line it is written in short and long dashes, which have to be interpreted. In the Pollak-Virag system the inventors place a telephone diaphragm at the receiving end, and this diaphragm is deflected both horizontally and vertically by the electric impulses received. Attached to the diaphragm is a small mirror, which moves as the diaphragm moves, and with the help of a ray of light reflected on it records the movement on a roll of photographic paper. It might thus record long strokes and short strokes, but by horizontal and vertical movement ingeniously imparted to the mirror these strokes are so combined as to form themselves into the semblance of stiff rectangular handwriting.

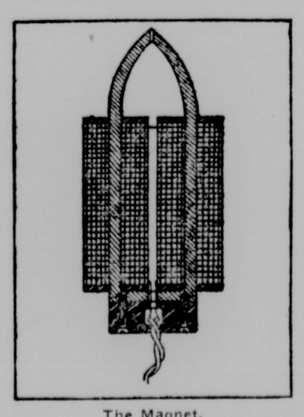


THE NEW POLLAK-VIRAG SYSTEM OF RAPID TELEGRAPHY.
It Will Send Forty-Four Thousand Words Per Hour.

ELECTRICAL EYE MAGNET.

Used for Extracting Substances Imbedded in the Eyeball.

Foreign particles of magnetic substances are difficult to extract from the eye, as they are usually sharp metallic substances which work in rather than out. Magnets are used to advantage in extracting iron filings and the like which are embedded in the eyeball. What are known as electric magnets are now being used for this work. That is, magnets which are wound with wire, through which an electric current is passed. Such magnets are much more powerful than the ordinary permanent magnet, and are designed to give almost any pull desired.



The Magnet.

A new form of eye magnet has been invented by an Ohio man. It is made with a U-shaped core, the points of which converge until they are close together, enabling the instrument to be brought to bear on the injured surface immediately over the particle to be extracted.

Single Phase Electric Roads.

A table giving statistics of single-phase electric railways in this country and in Europe has recently been prepared by the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. According to this table, there are 28 roads (two still under construction) in America with line voltages ranging from 1,200 volts to 1,000 volts. Thirteen of the roads are equipped to use either direct current or single-phase alternating current. The total number of locomotives used on these lines is 64. In Europe there are 34 single-phase roads using line voltage ranging from 500 to 20,000 volts, and they are equipped with 44 locomotives.

Waxing Shovel for Shoveling Snow.

During last winter there came a deep snow, and we had nothing to use for cleaning the walks except a pressed steel shovel. The snow would not slip from the shovel without a hard jerk on the shovel handle. This tired me and I began to think of a remedy, which resulted in taking the shovel and heating it with hot coals from the fire. When hot I applied it wax candle to the surface, covering it all over. The snow then would readily slip from the shovel

ROAD AND FARM IMPROVEMENT

HOLDING NEW SOIL.

The Time to Begin the Work of Improving is at Very First.

The time to begin to save and fertilize the soil is when it is new and rich in plant foods. Land which has always been in forest or wild grass and has never been broken by the plow has high possibilities when brought under cultivation. The soil of such lands is full of the roots of the plants which grew in it and the surface is more or less covered with dead vegetable matter. After the soil has been plowed and these plant remains decay much humus is formed and good crops can be grown.

New forest land just cleared and plowed does not as a rule produce a large crop the first season. But when the immense quantity of tree roots in the soil begin to decay and give up their fertility the soil becomes very fertile and will produce large crops. The roots of trees are very large and penetrate the earth to great depths. When they decay they not only leave available plant foods in the soil but leave deep openings in the subsoil up which deep soil water may rise and down which the roots of cultivated plants can easily go in search of sustenance. It requires several years for all of the tree stumps to fully decay, but as they decay they gradually give up fertilizing elements. By the time roots and stumps have all rotted on new land the soil should be in its highest state of fertility and none of this fertility should be allowed to wash away or otherwise go to waste. Some people farm new land carelessly, thinking that because it is now rich that it always will be so. They burn the trash on the surface and allow the top soil to wash away without any thought of the future.

Much new ground is planted to corn for the first three or four seasons. These corn crops are cut for fodder and the entire crop removed from the field, leaving the soil bare. If the land be at all hilly, the top rich soil of these new fields washes away during the winter and early spring. This annual loss of soil fertility is very large, and difficult to replace. There is seldom any attempt to either save the fertility or to increase it.

The richness of new ground, in the opinion of the Journal of Agriculture, should not only be conserved but increased as cultivation goes on. Manure and commercial fertilizers will do as much, if not more, good on new ground as they will on old ground. Commercial fertilizers should be used only when there is humus in the soil, and in new ground, if anywhere, their use is to be commended. All refuse vegetation should be saved and used on new ground so that the supply of vegetable mould would be increased rather than diminished. Instead of hauling away, or burning the stalks of a corn crop they should be carefully plowed into the soil where they will decay, hold the wash, and feed the soil. In like manner, all remains of rotten stumps and roots of trees should be covered with soil to decay beneath its surface.

There is no rational need of allowing new land to diminish in fertility, but very much need for it to increase in fertility.

A SNOW ROLLER.

After Heavy Fall of Snow It Packs the Road Bed.

Snow rollers are used for rolling the highways after a snowstorm to pack the snow down, which when frozen makes a road ten feet wide. The diagram shows how made. They are made with two drums 4½ feet long and five feet diameter, with two-inch steel shaft running through, on which they turn independently, thus permitting them to turn a corner easily. They are made of two-inch oak, the heads being double, and hooped with two by one-half-inch tire iron. The drums are hung in a strong frame and the pole goes through between, and they are about a foot apart. A seat frame is placed on the main frame over the drums, with a place for tools, etc. Four horses are required on the level river roads and six on the hill roads.

Better Education.

"In our judgment the most important single thing to be done for the general betterment of country life it is to provide better education. First, carry good teaching to the homes through the farmers' institute, bulletin, and local papers until our people fully realize that all the advantage does not lie with those in town. Second, adapt our country schools more closely to the needs of the country community"

WHAT'S THE ANSWER?

A young man stood before his mirror, putting the finishing touches to the toilet of which he felt justly proud. He was going to call upon The Girl's widowed mother to ask her daughter's hand in marriage.

Everything was ready but his tie. Before him, on the dressing-table, rested two creations, between which his choice now lay. One, a dream of black, striped narrowly with white, which he had himself purchased. The other, a nightmare, which The Girl had given him for a present—a tie such as women only buy.

"If I wear the black and white I'll look my best," he mused, "but if I wear the one She gave me, I'll please her immensely."

Then he whistled, walked around the room, and tied his tie.

The mother said: "Yes," although there were tears in her eyes, and The Girl thought he was the handsomest best-dressed fellow in the world. Which tie did he wear?

Proof Positive.

"One can't help knowing," said the dandy, "when one is good looking. Why, I got off at a small station the other day in the country, and I must confess that I attracted a great deal of attention."

"It doesn't mean anything," said his friend. "Why, when I get out of the Grand Central station I meet a crowd of men who yell 'Hansom! Hansom!' at the top of their lungs."—New York Herald.

An Appropriate Name.

Capt. Sealby of one of the White Star line's boats, was explaining to some passengers that his company had considerable difficulty in finding names for their new ships.

"They all have to end in 'ic,' you know," the captain explained.

A voyager, who was pale and seedy, said, as he looked dismally at the rolling ocean:

"For an appropriate name, I would suggest 'Seasic.'"—Judge.

The SECOND EDITION

By GEIK TURNER

(Copyright, by Shortstory Pub. Co.)

"How are things going?" asked the city editor, as he came in at six o'clock last evening?

"Rank," replied his assistant; "no end of cranks. This room's been a regular gibbering lunatic asylum all the afternoon. First, one fellow came in with an electric fly-killer, and then another with a bicycle sidewalk cleaner—sort of a snow-sweeper—and another had a patent compressed food pill, and there were several hundred men with communications to the editor. I'm all wasted away standing them off. That epileptic patient was up again, too, threatening to have a fit on our nice clean floor if we didn't put in a correction for him. He's the worst of the lot; he's a cuckoo, he is."

"What does he want now?" queried the chief. "He's had one item."

"That's what I told him. I said he'd been arrested for stealing, and we'd published the fact, and that when the police released him, we published that too; what else did he want? But he seemed to expect us to pledge ourselves to the dear public that he was innocent. Then I told him we hadn't said he was guilty in the first place, and in the second place, the police thought he was guilty, only they couldn't quite prove it. Anyway, we couldn't be expected to get out a 14-page paper every day vindicating him. Oh, we got quite heated up over it; had a regular joint debate on his previous record. I rather thought he'd be here when you came in, but by and by I tired him out, I guess, and he left. He wanted to know if the office was open this evening. I told him yes, it was, till four o'clock to-morrow morning. Considering we were a morning paper, we generally had to keep open nights."

It was 3:55 a. m., and the telegraph editor was cursing the newspaper business for the one hundred and eleventh time during the night. All of it was bad enough, he assured himself, but it was ghastly human sacrifice to compel a man to spend a large fraction of his life waiting two hours every morning, after "good-night" had come over the telegraph wire, to prevent a scoop on an impossible piece of telephone news.

He rattled the waste copy and newspapers before him off on the floor in an indiscriminate and wholesale attempt to clear up for the next day. The yellow glow from his electric lamp, hemmed in by its green paper shade, shone down across his face, and made his desk a little island of golden light in the big black news room. The monotonous ticking of the old office clock filled the empty place with its exaggerated noise. Outside he heard the groups of compositors, as they were discharged, go laughing and clattering down the stairway until their noise died away in the lower stories and disappeared into the street.

After a little silence there was another step that he couldn't account for—a peculiar shambling step, evidently directed upstairs. Probably, he thought, it was the janitor, or one of the compositors who had forgotten something and was coming back—only it didn't seem like the janitor's walk, and the compositors seldom took that kind of gait when they were hurrying back.

The strange step passed directly by the composing-room and into the editorial hall, and the big glass door slammed after it. It wavered and stopped at the local room, and then after a moment continued down the corridor, hesitating from time to time as its owner shook violently at the doors of the editorial writers' rooms. And then at last it passed on by degrees, until it stopped definitely at the threshold of the news room.

"Where's the editor?" asked a voice from outer darkness.

I'm one of the editors," said the telegraph man, looking up.

"You ain't the one I saw," said the voice suspiciously. "Tall, fat fellow, with a big mustache; what do you call him?"

"Oh, he's the city editor," said the telegraph man.

"Yes, that's it; where's he?"

"Gone.."

"Gone!"

The stranger had come up into the penumbra around the electric light. He was a tall, thin man, in a slouch hat and a pale brown overcoat. In one hand he carried a slip of paper, and in the other something metallic, apparently, that looked like a bunch of gas pipe. He was a peculiar looking man. His face was long and white, and his hands were painfully bony, and his eyes certainly did look queer. He had the air of a person who wanted something very badly, and had made up his mind to have it very soon. The telegraph man sized him up for a crank.

"Yes," said that functionary, "he's been gone for two or three hours." He began to get up and reached out for the lamp, hoping to shut off debate simultaneously with the light.

"Hold on," said the stranger, with the air of one having authority. The telegraph editor was a little man, whose best stock in trade in a heated argument was always discretion—and the stranger loomed up indefinitely above him. After a second's hesitation, the editor decided to reason with him.

"What do you want to have done?" he said.

"I've got a correction here you've got to make," said the stranger.

"Oh, I can't do that sort of thing," said the telegraph man, cheerfully, "you'll have to see the city editor. Come around this afternoon about two o'clock."

He reached up his hand again to the electric light.

"You sit down," said the stranger, with a tone of frank determination. At the same time he brought his right hand up into the light with the bunch of gas pipe. It was a revolver, with a bore like a small tunnel. He pressed the muzzle up against one eyebrow of the telegraph man, who stared wildly down along the barrel and saw the conical bullets peeping out of their holes in the cylinder, like the heads of nasty little animals peering out of their burrows. He sat down hurriedly.

The old office clock ticked loud and apprehensively. Outside in the hall, the foreman of the composing-room and his assistant closed the rear of the procession of compositors and left the telegraph man alone on the floor with his visitor. The silence was very impressive.

"I ain't comin' up here again," the stranger said finally, "I've come often enough already. I've been thinking this thing over all night long, and now I'm goin' to have it in the paper tomorrow, and it's goin' to be in to suit me this time. I've written it out myself. Here, you read that; that's what I want."

He let down his revolver with his right hand and brought up the piece of paper in his left. It was a dirty sheet, torn out of a blank book, apparently, covered with coarse writing in a lead pencil, and blurred and dirty with erasures.

The telegraph man lapped off his lips a couple of times and began to scan the paper obediently. This is what what he read:

"The hell-brats of the law say that Mr. Abel Hoffenheimer is a thief. They lie. He ain't a thief, and they know it. But still they hold him, and they throw him into loathsome cells and persecute him always with their deadly hate. They have their reasons for doing what they do. There is a conspiracy against him—a blood-red, stony-hearted, hell-fed conspiracy. We know what it is and who made it, and they would hound him to his death if they only could. But let them beware. We know what, but we ain't saying. Only this much. Their time will come. As for us not wanting to do no man no injury, we go down on our knees and we lap the dust before him and eat all the words we have wrote about him."

"That's it," said the stranger appreciatively, when the telegraph man had quavered through this text. "Now what do you call your head man—the boss of the place, I mean?"

"Managing editor," responded his victim meekly.

"What's his name?" queried the stranger.

"Mr. Penfield."

"Well, you write at the end of that 'signed,' and then you put down his name."

So the telegraph man wrote down at the bottom, "Signed, Erastus J. Penfield, managing editor."

"Now that's the way you're goin' to put it in," said the stranger.

"But I can't put it in to-morrow; all the compositors have gone home," said the telegraph man plaintively.

This statement had an unpleasant effect on the stranger; it excited him.

"You're an editor, ain't you?" he asked.

"Yes, that is—yes, I suppose I am."

"Well, an editor can get an item into the paper, can't he?" continued the stranger, with convincing logic.

"Yes," said the telegraph man, "but he can't print them; the compositors do that, you know."

The stranger didn't know about that; all he knew was that the correction was going in, and if there wasn't anybody else to do it, the telegraph man would have to do it himself.

"But I can't print. I'd like to, first rate," said the telegraph man pathetically, "but I can't. I never printed anything in my life."

But the stranger was obdurate; he said the editor would have to learn, because that correction was going in.

"This paper didn't treat me right; no, it didn't," he went on; "it said I stole."

The memory of his wrongs made him rather maudlin for a minute. The telegraph man didn't like to see him maudlin, because it made him wave his gun about in such a careless, irresponsible way. But the stranger was not long in mastering his emotions.

"You see that," he said, shoving the tunnel of the revolver into the telegraph man's face again.

The telegraph man confessed that he saw it.

"If I let that off into you, you darned little runt," the stranger continued, "there wouldn't be anything left of you but a rim. Now it's either one thing or the other; either I get that correction or I feed you what's in there. I'm goin' to have that item corrected if I have to wipe out everybody in this concern, one after another. And I'd just as soon begin with you as anybody. Now, are you goin' to give me that correction, or ain't you?"

"I'll try," murmured the telegraph man.

So they formed in single file and marched out through the crooked hall into the composing-room, without further remarks. The telegraph man, who went ahead, felt the cold wind blowing out of that revolver on the back of his neck every step, and he wasn't in the mood for frivolous conversation. The only remark made by the stranger was to the effect that he was damned if he didn't believe he'd shoot him anyway; which the telegraph man was prayerfully pleased to consider a selfish and unprofitable jest.

The procession passed into the stale tobacco smoke of the jet-black and deserted composing-room, and halted while the telegraph man turned on the electric light. It then passed on again to the speaking-tube to the pressroom, where the telegraph man carefully explained that he was free from guile in calling up the people downstairs, because the press always had to be stopped when a correction was made. The stranger said nothing, but poked the end of the tunnel into the cerebellum of the telegraph man with great eloquence. Then the telegraph man rang the electric bell.

"Hello," he said to the head stereotyper, "you'll have to have them stop the press and put on another page."

It was 4:15 o'clock. The language of the head stereotyper was unparliamentary in the extreme. What was the use, he argued, at this time of morning.

"It's a correction. I've just got to make it," said the telegraph editor, feeling the ring of the revolver barrel crowded into the back of his head. "Really I've got to, it's very important."

The head stereotyper appreciated the necessity of a very important correction, though his tone of voice didn't indicate it.

"Well, get a gait on you," he said, among other things, "it'll only be in the city anyway."

Downstairs the rattling of the big press diminished and stopped.

The procession in the composing-room formed again and marched to the switch that turned on the current to the dynamo, and the gearing of the type-setting machines started up. The performance occupied some eras for the telegraph man, but at last it was done.

Then the procession formed again and went over and took a proof on the proof machine. It wasn't a very artistic piece of printing that appeared, but, as the telegraph man reminded his chief pro tem, it was his first attempt and you couldn't expect too much. His chief finally passed it. But he was particular about its position.

"I want that where everybody's goin' to see it," he said. "Now, where's the place your boss puts what he writes?"

The telegraph man murmured it was the editorial page, and the stranger said that was what he wanted.

So the editorial form was hauled out, and the correction went in at the head of the first column in double leads. The telegraph man jabbed out a small editorial on the foreign question to make a place for it, hammered down the page as level as he could, screwed it up and sent it down the form elevator.

When they heard the press starting up again, the telegraph man explained that the correction was made.

But the stranger intimated that he did his business in a more thorough manner.

"When do I see the paper?" he asked.

"Why, if you want to, you can see it right now. Just let me go down after it. I'd be very glad to get it for you," said the telegraph man, starting for the stairway immediately, in his anxious effort to oblige.

"Oh, no you don't," said the stranger. The telegraph man didn't.

"Ain't there any other way to get that paper up here?" asked the former, with a meaning flourish of his revolver.

"Well—yes—there is. They can [illegible] the pneumatic tube in the news room, I guess," admitted the editor.

This idea being satisfactory, an adjournment was made to the news room and the paper was called for down the speaking-tube. It came up immediately, fresh and warm from the press.

"Supposing," said the telegraph man to himself, with horror, "that correction doesn't satisfy him now."

But, fortunately, the contributor was very much satisfied with his appearance in print. He read it over himself first, and then invited the telegraph man to read it aloud in order that he might get the general effect. The telegraph man's elocution wasn't very artistic; in fact, he found some difficulty in reading at all, but apparently it delighted the stranger, for he encored continually. Indeed, the telegraph man had floundered through this bit of unique journalism a dozen times, and could hardly wag his tongue, when his guest was finally satiated.

"Well, I guess that'll do," he said at last. Then, having instructed the telegraph man that he needn't venture out of the news room before seven a. m., unless he were anxious to be filled full of holes, he left with a final dramatic flourish of the revolver.

The last the telegraph man saw of him he was striding majestically out of the news room door, waving his paper in one hand and his gun in the other, with the proud air of a man whose mission in life was accomplished.

What the telegraph man said when he was found by the janitor late that morning will never be put into print.

And the managing editor, when he opened his paper at the breakfast table—well, what do you think the managing editor said?

Health.

Bad as conditions are to-day, great progress has been made during the last 20 years. People are growing more careful as to what they eat and drink. There is no city that is not bestirring itself to improve its water supply and its system of sanitation. The demand for more fresh air is almost a fad in progressive communities.

Two Great Railroad Kings

The phrase "railroad king" and "railroad magnate" have been current in this country many years and have been applied without much discrimination. A railroad magnate might be president of a single system of dispenser of free passes under the old dispensation. The term "railroad king" antedates that of "railroad magnates," and it originated in England in the early days of railroading before there was a mile of steam railroad in the United States.

One of the earliest "railroad kings" in this country was John W. Garrett of Baltimore, president of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad from 1858 till his death in 1884, a period of twenty six years. His service in financing and pushing that great entrance to completion stamped him as a railroad king of a very different type from the modern railroad wreckers and stock jobbers. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad was the first chartered and organized railroad project in the United States. A few miles of tramway or rail tracks were laid before but the Baltimore and Ohio was the first company organized for the prosecution of a real railroad project. This was in 1827.

Its first board of directors included Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence. In 1827 the building of a steam railroad across the Allegheny mountains was more than a gigantic undertaking; it was a bold dream. The cornerstone of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad was laid on July 4, 1828, by Charles Carroll, who remarked after performing the services: "I consider this among the most important acts of my life, second only to my signing of the Declaration of Independence, if even it be second to that."

At that time Mr. Carroll was past ninety years of age, and the only surviving signer of the Declaration.

Without following the progress of the road in detail, it did get across the mountains and its opening to Wheeling, W. Va., was celebrated in that town on January 19, 1853. The president of the road at that time was Thomas Swann, who was Governor of Maryland during the Civil War. But the biggest man in the history of the road, a giant in railroad financing and promotion, was John W. Garrett. He was the first American "railroad king." But he was antedated by a railroad king in England where the phrase originated.

When the feasibility of railroad transportation first began to be developed in England there lived in the City of New York a man named George Hudson. He was a linen draper by trade, having served an apprenticeship at the business, and followed it several years. But he had a taste for politics and finances and aspired to something better than working at a trade.

In 1833 he had risen to be the head of the Conservative party in New York. In 1835 he was a town councillor, in 1836 an alderman, and in 1837 lord mayor. He was evidently what is called in this country a "Hustler." But he must have had foresight and imagination, for he foresaw the future possibilities of railway transportation when railroads were still in their infancy in England.

The first steam road in England, the Stockton & Darlington was chartered in 1821, and operated in 1825. This line, with three branches, was thirty-eight miles long. In 1838, a line was opened between London and Birmingham, and during the next five years, England was pretty well gridironed with railroads.

Hudson got in the business early and went in like a plunger. As early as 1837, he was made president of the York & North Midland railroad, with a capital stock of $2,230,000 of which he subscribed five times as much as any other director and personally guaranteed the payment of 6 per cent dividends. For a recent linen draper this was doing pretty well.

In 1842 he organized a $25,000,000 syndicate to build what was called the Midland railroad, in which he co-operated with George Stephenson, the inventor of the locomotive. Stephenson started as a fireman at a colliery and it was characteristic of the times that a fireman and a linen draper should become the two heads of the great railroad movement in England. But they were both men of genius and nerve. Space would fail to enumerate the railroad enterprises which Hudson organized and promoted. In 1844 his admirers raised by popular subscription a fund of $80,000 as a testimony of their respect. He was recognized as a political power. In 1845 he was elected to Parliament although John Bright and Richard Cobden, the free trade champions, both opposed him.

He remained in Parliament fourteen years, and all the time was promoting railroad schemes, consolidations, mergers, etc. Financially, his position was always precarious, because of the magnitude and boldness of his activities, but he was able to enrich many personal friends by "inside" information and the people called him the railroad king. He numbered Queen Victoria's husband among his acquaintances and the aristocracy of England crowded his receptions. One after another he became the owner of some of the finest estates in England. Kings, princes and noblemen danced attendance upon him.

Financially speaking, a breath of his could make or unmake them. The mere rumor of his connection with a new railroad enterprise sent the shares soaring skyward. He was a poor speaker, but he took and held a high place in Parliament. He affected great brusqueness of manner, and would cut off with a few words a banker or a nobleman who came to ask a monetary favor. Yet he stood by his friends and enriched many of them by "inside tips" regarding investments.

For several years no breath of scandal attached to his name, but he was riding to a fall. Like many another great promoter and speculator, he "bit off more than he could chew." When a pinch came he began paying dividends out of the capital instead of earnings, and in three years no less than $1,470,000 was dishonestly diverted. Hudson and his friends insisted that he was simply trying to tide over an emergency but the people looked at it differently.

Public meetings were held and he was asked to resign the presidency of several railroads. From his place in Parliament he tried to explain the situation, but he was listened to coldly. Suits were brought against him which resulted in twenty years' litigation. After 1846 he lived much on the continent and tried to operate in continental finances, but without success. In July, 1865, having returned to England, he was committed to jail in York, of which city he had twice been lord mayor, for contempt of court in not paying a large debt. Three years later in 1868, some former friends raised by subscription $24,000 to purchase a life annuity for him and this constituted his main support for the rest of his life. He still had friends, however, and a number of them gave him a public banquet.

A contemporary writer describing him at the height of his power says: "It was told with pleasure and repeated with delight that his empire extended over a thousand miles of railway. His fortune was computed with an almost personal pride. The choicest aristocracy of England sought his presence. Foreign potentates sued for his society. The coronet of the peer was veiled before the crown of the railroad king. The minister paid him court and the bishop paid him homage. The ermine of the judge lost its dignity and the uniform of the officer its pride.

"The Christian banker and the Hebrew capitalists alike acknowledged his greatness. Men heard of his buying estates and they honored him. His alliance was sought by patricians; his children were the companions of peers. When his name graced an advertisement, men ran to buy the shares. In lines known to be worthless and in which no business was doing, if a rumor was spread that Hudson was after them the Stock Exchange was in a ferment and prices rose enormously. He was the people's railway potentate; their iron king, their golden god."

Yet Englishmen have always accused Americans of worshiping the almighty dollar. For a former linen draper, Hudson played the game well. One who knew him at the height of his power describes his as "of extraordinary size; his frame naturally broad and massive, with a tendency to developed every way but upward. He is scarcely of the middle height and very round; but his chest is broad and well thrown out and although ungainly and even clumsy in his movements, he is strong, active and muscular. He walks with great effort, his large arms swinging vigorously to aid the difficult action of his legs, yet he gets over ground more rapidly than the average man.

"His head is a formidable looking engine, it is round and as stern looking as a fortytwo-pounder. In fitting it on the body the formality of a neck has been dispensed with. The face carries a whole battery; the eyes are quick and piercing, the mouth firm and characteristic of resolution."

This remarkable man, the first "railway king," died in London December 14, 1871.

The Ideal Meal.

The ideal meal consists of bread, butter, and cheese, according to Dr J. E. Squire, who delivered a lecture to the British National Health society. "These foods," he said, "contain all the elements necessary for the proper working of the body, and thus form a complete meal."

BULL HUNT IN A RAILROAD TUNNEL

ECHOES OF HOOF BEATS HEARD COMING AND RECORD TIME IS MADE TO DAYLIGHT.

ENGINEER WARNED OF DANGER

Cab Driver, Detective and Policeman All Vanquished by the Bovine Terror, Who Finally Becomes Disgusted with Passage.

Seattle.—An escaped bull, bellowing with rage and fright and dragging a long rope which was attached to his horns, charged into the Great Northern tunnel here shortly before five o'clock the other evening. The animal had been unloaded from a car in the switch yards and two men had undertaken to lead it with a stout rope when the bull decided to go in a wholly different direction. The bull prevailed, and finding easy going beneath the Jackson street bridge, plunged into the gloom of the tunnel, where it could be alone in its hour of grief and fright.

Two 'bus drivers who were waiting for trains viewed the terrifying spectacle of the bull and the cloud of cinders, and straightway informed Patrolman George Osborn that the tunnel was full of bulls.

"Maybe it was buffaloes," said one 'bus driver. "We just saw the air full of dust and a string of bulls a block long go into the tunnel."

Detective Lee Barbee was at the station, and joined with Patrolman Osborn in the hunt. The trail was picked up at the mouth of the tunnel, where the rope had dragged in the mud. The policemen decided that the bull could not wander far afield beneath the city, and started at a brisk run.

When they arrived at a point almost beneath the Lincoln hotel, Detective Barbee heard hoof steps in the pitchy dark.

"Say, Osborn," said Detective Barbee, "did you ever meet a big, woolly-headed bull in a dark tunnel?"

They Swarmed Out of the Tunnel in About 10 Flat.

"Never did," replied Patrolman Osborn. "Met a bull in a pasture in Illinois, but as we were soon going in the same direction pretty rapidly, I never got much acquainted."

"Well, the thought occurred to me that somebody ought to warn the engineer of the north-bound train," said Detective Barbee. "Now, you stay here and hold the bull in check while I flag the train."

"No, let's both flag the train," said Patrolman Osborn. "I don't know this bull at all, and maybe he doesn't speak my language."

Echoes of hoof beats coming toward the men decided the question, and they swarmed out of the tunnel in about ten flat.

When they informed the engineer of the danger ahead, that genial monarch of the locomotive laughed.

"Come into the tunnel in about ten minutes and see if I have met the bull," said he. Then the train pulled out.

Fifteen minutes later the bull, uninjured and disgusted with tunnel life, promenaded on the King street station platform. Four stout baggage smashers seized the rope and the animal was returned to its owner.

Ostrich Snaps Girl's Nose.

Long Beach, Cal.—Miss Bertha Proctor, secretary of the Long Beach ostrich farm, is suffering from a mutilated nose, the result of an encounter with one of the old birds at the farm. She was viewing the creatures and one of them attempted to take a nail she was holding in her fingers. Being repulsed, it attacked her, snapped her nose and held on to it for two or three minutes. The marks of the injury will remain some time, but the attending physician does not think they will be permanent.

Bull Derails Trolley Car.

West Chester, Pa.—On account of the dense fog, a trolley car over the Kennett division of the West Chester street railway struck and killed a valuable bull belonging to William Thatcher, near Unionville Junction, as the animal was crossing the tracks. The trolley car was derailed and traffic was tied up for two hours, though no one was injured.

Abraham Lincoln Typified American Spirit.

America no longer can be accused of not preserving her ideals, for this remarkable centennial year, which the stars in their courses appear to have marked with a potent significance, every town, city and State is offering tribute to the most distinctive figure in our history of the last century. While many men have taken part in the historical drama of America, only two stand out as emblematic of its climacteric periods of construction and reconstruction. These two are Washington and Lincoln.

It has been said that Lincoln, more than any other man, typified the American spirit as it had developed up to the time of his death, and whether this be true or not, a multitude of memorable events have been celebrated; but no one man has been so widely commemorated. The closing of Lincoln's life alone, as woeful and terrible as if set in the tragedy of classic drama of a thousand years ago, creates a magnetic point of concentration in America's history which makes only more vivid the ensuing 44 years.

Since that period of reconstruction there has evolved a gigantic accumulation of responsibilities to confront America. The problems of capital and labor, trusts and people, education, finance, railroads, corporations, all have increased in mass and in complexity until the country is threaded over and through with an interplay of interests, comprising at present more than one national dilemma. And the portent of all this points to a future period of reconstruction, the inevitable nemesis of evolution. This interplay of interests, fortunately, could not arise without the interplay and response of sympathies. And now, on a broader educational plane, having had time to acquire the more liberal perceptions which spring from reciprocity and, perhaps with a larger growth of Christian entics, the United States has learned that the time to remember it also the time to forget.

It would be impo sible to notice all Lincoln literature. A few years ago Judge Fish of Minneapolis compiled a bibliography of Lincoln publications, containing 1000 titles, and ever since then they have been rapidly on the increase. In 1860 William Dean Howells, then a young journalist, wrote a campaign life of the candidate for the Presidency, which is said to have been the earliest Lincoln biography in print. The next in importance is that of J. G. Holland, and later that of John Hay was bought by the Century for $50,000 and published serially in that magazine, Mr. Hay having been closely at Lincoln's side from the time of his inauguration. Then Miss Tarbell made it her business to hunt out men who had known Lincoln personally, and who were living in the nineties, and to get their homely opinions. Within the past few months much literature in reference to the coming centenary has appeared, and among that which is note-worthy and substantial is "The Reminiscenses of Abraham Lincoln by Distinguished Men of His Time," collected and edited by Allen Thorndyke Rice, and published by the Harper's, containing the recollections of men whose idenity with the nation has been close. But perhaps the most intimate study at present is Richard Watson Gilder's "Lincoln, the Leader," published in the Century. Another work of insight and careful preparation is "Lincoln, the Boy and the Man," by James Morgan, published by the Macmillans. Possibly this author has best escaped the tendency of over-idealization, which is the snare of the biographer.

Whereas the character of Lincoln in life was surrounded by that aloofness inseparable from the human being who is marked by genius, or better still, by the genius of great character, now, after many years, we are in possession of a vivid piece of portraiture. It would seem as if thousands had arisen to probe this character to the soul, to expose its meanings. The tributaries which make up the stream of this literature have merged into a wave of vital interest, expressing the zeal and research of hundreds of minds. Through the concensus of eye-witnesses, private soldiers, generals, prisoners, statesmen, men and women of every rank of life, friends or former foes—have volunteered to piece together this mosaic, until the particles have welded and have given us an impressive picture of Lincoln, the man.

We have him as the executive, in the Cabinet, the war, in private life, as the soldier's friend. We have his personal kindness, his sympathy, his forbearance, his humor, his mastery of men, his simplicity and his standard of leadership. In all this testimony, which makes up the most poignant and solitary life-drama that America has produced, it is the final act of woeful climax which now is best passed over with the touch of sorrow. History, as well as individual life, has its reserves made sacred through association.

All the harrowing minutiae of the plot to abduct Lincoln, and that of his assassination, is given in detail by Clara E. Laughlin in her book, "The Death of Lincoln," which is published by Doubleday & Page. Detective like, she has threaded every step of the way trodden by the two fateful figures—the assassin and his subject. While the narrative of this cannot be wholly free from theatricality, the book claims to have the merit of authenticity, as the author verifies her statement by references and foot notes. But in the march of events, in the nation's historic progress, as in man's life, there is always the body of fact to be buried and left to the healing of time, and this book resurrects not only facts but all the minute detail surrounding that pivotal episode in our history, which, like certain tragedies of the French Revolution, are almost too acutely painful to require bald repetition

The author of "The Death of Lincoln" leaves nothing of this distressful climax unexposed, unhandled. Undoubtedly, Wilkes Booth believed in himself. The creature of excitable impulses usually has faith in his moment of emotional action. The extracts from his diary manifest the same disconnectedness, excitability and lack of poise evidenced in his letters. A gleam of miserable doubt visited him when he wrote: "God cannot pardon me—I have done wrong. Yet I can see no wrong." The capture and death of Booth are vividly described and concerning the identification of Booth's body, Miss Laughlin bases her statements upon information given her by the Booth and Ford families. She prints, also, the testimony of various eye-witnesses, who claim to have held intercourse with Wilkes Booth afterward in Canada, but does not comment upon, nor attempt their verification.

Certainly to accept Abraham Lincoln as a national type is to admit the necessity of a more liberal national policy. As a frontiersman of Illinois, he has said of himself, in personal sketch of his own life: "It was a wild region, with wild animals still in the woods. There I grew up. There were some schools, so called, but no qualification was ever required of a teacher beyond readin', writin' and cipherin' to the rule of three. If a straggler supposed to understand Latin happened to sojourn in the neighborhood he was looked upon as a wizard. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition and education."

Yet, as a woodsman, hired by other men to work with his hands, Lincoln was an insatiate lover of books and secured the few he could, and it is known that he was an early student of Shakespeare. Writing of Lincoln's position among his neighbors in Illinois, James Morgan, in "Lincoln, the Boy and Man," tells how, when a wagon was stalled in the narrow street of Salem, he was the first to go to the driver's aid. If a widow were in need of firewood he cut it for her. If he found a mistake in change across his counter he did not sleep until he had corrected the error. All relied upon the honesty of "Honest Abe," and men grew early to respect him for his strength of character as well as strength of body.

Lincoln was 38 when he took his seat in Congress, and the time was well chosen. Mr. Morgan points out that the eloquence of Webster and the philosophy of Calhoun were then competitive, and among the noted men nearest Lincoln were Cass, Corwin, Houston, Jefferson Davis, Hannibal Hamlin, Horace Greeley, and, above all, John Quincy Adams. At the start Lincoln's gift for dominating men marked him from the crowd, and he early attracted the attention of Daniel Webster. Yet the author admits that Lincoln's nomination to the Presidency remains one of the mysteries of politics. When, however, it was announced, the name was received with such an uproar as never had been heard in a national convention.

But a wholly different picture is given of his inaugural day. Like his youth, love and marriage, his inauguration was shadowed by foreboding and the augury of fatality.

Abraham Lincoln had always been pronounced an uncommonly ugly man. This is forgotten when one looks into the eyes of his portrait, eyes of profound melancholy, the eyes of the seer, which had prophesied, foreseen and endured, eyes which could not be amazed at any wreckage man might work. His face tells the story of his life; it is the rugged face of profound, uncomplaining struggle, of endless endeavor. It has been said that those who follow closely the philosophy of Lincoln's life must be impressed with the equal serenity of his temperament, in adversity or victory. No man could have borne defeat more nobly, none could have endured triumph more sorrowfully.

The stories of his personality, told by eye witnesses, are too numerous even to begin upon, but this slight incident, related by Ednah Dean Proctor in the National Magazine, is a touch of intimate impression.

"He was in the Red Room," she writes, "his towering, slightly stooping form, as he leaned against the grand piano that faced the door, appeared of heroic mold. Speaking with us pleasantly, he made no illusion to the disastrous news, but it was soon evident that, while he stood there with courteous greetings, he was almost oblivious of his surroundings, and that heart and soul were lost in contemplation of the country's peril. It was my first view of him, and I have never forgotten the infinite dignity of his presence that evening and the melancholy, far-off look in his eyes—a dignity and elevation quite beyond and above what any mere manly beauty could give. As I watched him I thought no words could better describe him than these: 'A man of sorrows.'

"There was little conversation, but one of the party remarked: 'I hope Mr. President, you are able to sleep, notwithstanding your heavy burdens.'

"At that moment General —— was ushered into the room—a short, stout man, with a blustering, pompous manner. He heard the remark, and immediately added in a bold, confident tone, 'I presume, Mr. President, you sleep as much as the private soldiers on the Rappahannock.'

"Mr. Lincoln looked down on him with a loftiness that was almost scorn, and said distinctly and with indescribable pathos:

" 'For that matter, sir, I would gladly change places with the poorest soldier in the ranks.'

"We soon made our adieux, but the brief interview has remained a treasured memory."

The incidents of Lincoln's forbearance and sympathy are legion, and in many instances are not more valuable as records of kindly deeds than because of the unerring quality of some accompanying word. A typical episode is that of Mrs. Winston's appeal for her 17-year-old boy, who was attending a Southern school and, without his mother's consent, had entered the army. He was wounded at Nashville and taken to the garrison hospital at Fort McHenry. Hearing of his extreme illness, his mother, wild with grief, followed him, but owing to the order prohibiting all communication between prisoners and citizens, she could not see him. While conferrring with the post surgeon she caught sight of her emaciated boy through an open door, and broke from the surgeon, flew to her son and took him in her arms. A day later she appealed to Secretary Stanton for the release of this wounded boy, but he ordered her roughly from his presence and refused to see her. She then made her petition to the President, and when asked afterward how she was received said:

"With the kindness of a brother."

"Tell me what I can do for you, madam," he said, and when he had read the appeal:

"Are you the mother of this unhappy wounded boy?"

"I am," she said.

"And do you believe that he will honor his parole if I permit him to go with you?"

"I am ready to peril my personal liberty upon it," she answered.

"Then you shall have your boy," said Lincoln, "to take him from the ranks of rebellion, and give him to a loyal mother is a better investment for the Government than to give him up to enemies. God grant that he may prove a blessing to you, madam, and an honor to his country."

He then wrote an order for the boy's release.

Certain striking characteristics of Lincoln have impressed themselves forcibly upon his biographers and now stand out in their relations to the meaning of the man. First came that of his faith in God and of his all-unconscious mastery of men through sympathy and toleration. Robert Ingersoll has said that Lincoln is the gentlest memory of our world. "Complex in brain, single in heart, direct as light. Never afraid to ask, never too dignified to admit that he did not know. No man had keener wit or kinder humor. He was a logician, and logic is the child of a clear head and a good heart. He had intellect without arrogance, genius without pride, religion without bigotry."

Richard Watson Gilder, speaking to Col. Hay of these traits said:

"Colonel, as you continue your study of Lincoln and your writing about him, does he seem to you greater or less?"

To this John Hay answered:

"As I go on with the work Lincoln grows greater and greater."

Again Mr. Gilder alludes to Lincoln's faculty of strong statement as exceeding that of Webster and Burke, and as a miracle of style. But there seems no good reason to look upon Lincoln's power of expression as miraculous. Nature is the miracle worker of the ages, and Lincoln sprung from strong, natural sources. His manhood was, after a fashion, fathered by nature and the woods; by the natural hard effort which makes men. He was a natural product, with the attributes of simplicity and force of character, which gave him simplicity and force of style.

The quality, however, to which Mr. Gilder alludes particularly is the cadence of his prose, its traits of tolerance and human sympathy, of pathos and imagination, without sentimentality. There is a strain in the two inaugurals, says Mr. Gilder, and in the letter of consolation to a bereaved mother, which has moved the hearts of generations. This is the letter:

The Executive Mansion,
Washington, Nov. 21, 1864.

To Mrs. Bixby:

Dear Madam—I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering you the consolation which may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours very sincerely and respectfully,
A. LINCOLN.

But perhaps the most important point concerning Lincoln's written words is one which Mr. Gilder also points out—that notwithstanding that the country has been ransacked for every scrap of paper upon which he wrote, and for the record of every public speech, no discreditable word has ever been discovered, and no expression that can be adversely criticised. Especially are his speeches free from intentional oratory and egotism. This is the record of one whose teacher was an honesty of character which strove to make his true meaning clear, and which gave to his expression both force and beauty.

The natural desire of Lincoln was to be the brother of men rather than to dominate them. He had longed for a simple and peaceful life—to "sit by the fireside of the heart," yet sway men he did. In history it is peculiarly significant that men have believed finally in the characters of those who have had selflessness of purpose and faith in God. Belief in a greater and a divine power was the background of Lincoln's reasoning, the fire behind his leadership. And these simple traits have been weighed in the balance of an inexorable justice—that of time—and have not been found wanting. V. W. C.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. H. G. Stoerts, of Keyser, W. Va., came to the Park Tuesday morning and in company with Supt. Davis made an examination of the foundation of the postoffice building, the presumption being that Mr. Stoerts was preparing to make a bid for the new building which we understand will be erected on the old site before the opening of the coming season. We are informed that Mr. Stoerts contemplates buying or building a home here and becoming a permanent resident. We hope he may do so.

We are informed that Mr. Adam Long has decided to resign his position as foreman of the grounds in the spring. Should he do so it is the universal wish that he and his family may remain with us.

Ex-Judge T. H. Cuppett has sold his farm near Sang Run and will soon be a permanent resident here. He will improve and occupy his cottage on E street. Such additions are an advantage to any community.

The special services at Bond are still in progress. Fifteen have professed conversion and a number are still at the altar. The services will be continued until the latter part of next week, when Rev. Bolton will commence special services here.

A Ladies' Aid Society has been organized by the ladies of the Loch Lynn Baptist church.

Mr. Ed. Rathbun, who is employed in the paper mill at Luke, Md., will take his family there as soon as he can get a house.

Rev. Stoneking, the U. B. pastor of this circuit, has moved from Loch Lynn to the parsonage at Pleasant Valley.

Thursday morning last a force went to work on the lake cutting ice, but they had to give it up before night, after loading two cars and storing a few tons in the ice house. The horse which was being used in the ice plow broke through the ice and was gotten to the shore with some difficulty. If the present cold "snap" should produce ice six inches thick or more the plant will be run to its utmost capacity both day and night.

The young men's Sunday School class will hold their monthly social at Haydenhurst cottage tomorrow night.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scorned by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

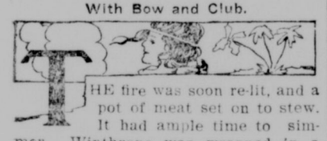
CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.

With Bow and Club.



THE fire was soon re-lit, and a pot of meat set on to stew. It had ample time to simmer. Winthrope was wrapped in a life-giving sleep, out of which he did not awaken until evening, while Blake, unable to wait for the pot to boil, and nauseated by the fishy odor of the dried seafowl, hunted out the jerked leopard meat, and having devoured enough to satisfy a native, fell asleep under a bush.

The sun was half down the sky when he sat up and looked around, wide awake the moment he opened his eyes. Miss Leslie was quietly placing an armful of sticks on the fuel heap beside the baobab.

"Hello, Miss Jenny! Hard at it, I see," he called cheerfully.

"Hush!" she cautioned. "Mr. Winthrope is still asleep."

"Good thing for him. He'll need all of that he can get."

"Then you think—"

"Well, between you and me, I don't believe Win was built for the tropics. This fever of his, coming on so soon, wouldn't have hit nine men in ten half so hard. He's bound to have another spell in a month or two, and—"

"But cannot we possibly get away from here before then? Is there no way? Surely, you are so resourceful—"

"Nothing doing, Miss Jenny! Give me tools, and I'd engage to turn out a seagoing boat. But as it is, the only thing I could do would be to fire-burn a log. That would take two or three months, and in the end we'd have a lop-sided canoe that'd live about half a second in one of these tropic squalls."

"Do not the natives sail in canoes?"

"Maybe they do—and they make fire by rubbing sticks. We don't."

"But what can we do?"

"Take our medicine, and wait for a ship to show up."

"But we have no medicine."

"Have no— Say, Miss Jenny, you really ought to have stayed home from boarding-school and England long enough to learn your own language. I meant, we've got to take what's coming to us, without laying down or grouching. Both are the worst things out for malaria."

"You mean that we must resign ourselves to this intolerable situation—that we must calmly sit here and wait until the fever—"

"No; I'll take care we don't sit around very much. We'll go on the hike, soon as Win can wobble. Which reminds me, I've got a little hike on hand now. I'm going to close up that barricade before dark. Me for a quiet night!"

Without waiting for a reply, he took his weapons, and swung briskly away down the cleft.

He returned a few minutes before sunset, with what appeared to be a large fur bag upon his back. Miss Leslie was pouring a bowl of broth from the stew-pot, and did not notice him until he sang out to her: "Hey, Miss Jenny, spill over that stuff! No more of that in ours!"

"It's for Mr. Winthrope. He has just awakened," she replied, still intent on her pouring.

"And you'd kill him with that slop! Heave it over. He's going to have beef juice."

"Oh! what's that on your back? You've killed an antelope!"

"Sure! Bushbuck, I guess they call him. Sneaked up when he was drinking, and stuck an arrow into his side. He jumped off a little way, and turned to see what'd bit him. I hauled off and put the second arrow right through his eye, into his brain. Neatest thing you ever saw."

"You surely are becoming a splendid archer!"

"Yes; Jim dandy! I could do it again about once in 10,000 shots. All the same, I've raked in this peacherino. Trot out your grill and we'll have something fit to eat."

"You spoke of beef juice."

"I've a dozen steaks ready to broil. Slap 'em on the fire, and I'll squeeze out enough juice with my fist to do Win for to-night."

He made good his assertion, using several of the steaks, which, having lost less than half their juices in the process, were eaten with great relish by Miss Leslie and himself.

Winthrope, after drinking the stimulating beef juice and a quantity of hot water, turned over and fell asleep again while Blake was dressing his wounds. None of these was serious of itself; but Blake knew the danger of infection in the tropics, and carefully washed out the gashes before applying the tallow salve which Miss Leslie had tried out from the antelope fat.

The dressing was completed by torchlight. Blake then rolled the sleeper into a comfortable position, took the torch from Miss Leslie, and left the cave, pausing at the entrance to mutter a gruff good-night. The girl murmured a response, but watched him anxiously as he passed out. A step beyond the entrance he paused and turned again. In the red glare of the torch, his face took on an expression that filled her with fright. Shrouded by the gloom of the hollow, she drew back to her bed, and without turning her eyes away from him, groped for one of her bamboo stakes.

But before she could arm herself, she saw Blake stoop over and grasp with his free hand the mass of interwoven bamboos. He straightened himself, and the framework swung lightly up and over, until it stood on end across the cave entrance. The girl stole around and peered out at him. He had spread open the antelope skin, and was beginning to slice the meat for drying. Though his forehead was furrowed, his expression was by no means sinister. Relieved at the thought that the light must have deceived her, she returned to her bed and was soon sleeping as soundly as Winthrope.

Blake strung the greater part of the meat on the drying racks, built a smudge fire beneath, and stretched the antelope skin on a frame. This done, he took his club and a small piece of bloody meat, and walked stealthily down the cleft to the barricade. Quiet as was his approach, it was met by a warning yelp on the farther side of the thorny wall, and he could hear the scurry of fleeing animals.

He kept on until the barricade loomed up before him in the starlight. From cliff to cliff the wall now stretched across the gorge without hole or gap. But Blake grasped the trunk of a young date-palm which projected from the barricade near the bottom, and pushed it out. The displacement of the spiky fronds disclosed the low passage which he had made in the center of the barricade. He placed the piece of meat on one side, two or three feet from the hole, and squatted down across from it, with his club balanced on his shoulder.

Half an hour passed—an hour; and still he waited, silent and motionless as a statue. At last stealthy footsteps sounded on the outer side of the thorn wall, and an animal began to creep through the wall, sniffing for the bait. Blake waited with the immobility of an Eskimo. The delay was brief.

With a boldness for which Blake had not been prepared, the beast leaped through and seized the meat. Even in the dim light, Blake could see that he had lured an animal larger than any jackal. But this only served to lend greater force to his blow. As he struck, he leaped to his feet. The brute fell as though struck by lightning and lay still.

Blake prodded the inert form warily; then knelt and passed his hands over it. The beast had whirled about just in time to meet the descending club, and the blow had crushed in its skull. Chuckling at the success of his ruse, he drew the palm back into the opening, and swung his prize over his shoulder. When he came to the fire, a glance showed him that he had killed a full-grown spotted hyena.

In the morning, when Miss Leslie appeared, there were two hides stretched on bamboo frames, and the air was dark with vultures streaming down into the cleft near the barricade. Blake was sleeping the sleep of the just, and did not waken until she had built the fire and begun to broil the steaks which he had saved.

Again they had a feast of the fresh antelope meat. But with repletion came more of fastidiousness, and Blake agreed with Miss Leslie when she remarked that salt would have added to the flavor. He set off presently, and spent half a day on the talus of the headland, gathering salt from the rock crannies.

For the next three days he left the cleft only to gather eggs. The greater part of his time was spent in tanning the hyena and antelope skins. Meantime Miss Leslie continued to nurse Winthrope and to gather firewood. Under Blake's directions, she also purified the salt by dissolving it in a pot of water, and allowing the dirt to settle, when the clarified solution was poured off and evaporated over the fire in one of the earthenware pans.

At first Winthrope had been too weak to sit up. But treated to a liberal diet of antelope broth, raw eggs, hot water, and cocoanut milk, he gained strength faster than Blake had expected. On the fourth day Blake set him to work on the final rubbing of the new skins; on the fifth, he ordered him to go for eggs.

Much to Miss Leslie's surprise, Winthrope started off without a word of protest. All his peevish irritability had gone with the fever, and the girl was gratified to see the quiet manner in which he set about a task which seemed an imposition upon his half-regained strength. But the very motive which, seemingly, prevented him from protesting, impelled her to speak for him.

"Mr. Blake!" she exclaimed, "Mr. Winthrope is going off without a word; but I can't endure it! You have no right to send him on such an errand. It will kill him!"

Blake met her indignant look with a sober stare.

"What if it does?" he said. "Better for him to die in the gallant service of his fellows, than to sit here and rot. Eh, Win?"

"Do not trouble yourself, Miss Genevieve. I hope I shall pull through all right. If not—"

"No, you shall not! I'll go myself!"

"See here, Miss Leslie," said Blake, somewhat sternly: "who's got the responsibility of keeping you two alive for the next month or so? I've been in the tropics before, and I know something of the way people have to live to get out again. I'm trying to do my best, and I tell you straight, if you won't mind me, I'm going to make you, no matter how much it hurts your feelings. You see how nice and meek Win takes his orders. I explained matters to him last night—"

"I assure you, Blake, you shall have no cause for complaint as to my conduct," muttered Winthrope. "I should like to observe, however, that in speaking to Miss Leslie—"

"There you are again, with your everlasting talk. Cut it out, and get busy. To-morrow we all go on a hike to the river."

As Winthrope started off, Blake turned to Miss Leslie, with a good-natured grin.

"You see, it's this way, Miss Jenny—" he began. He caught her look of disdain, and his face darkened. "Mad, eh? So that's the racket!"

"Mr. Blake, I will not have you talk to me in that way. Mr. Winthrope is a gentleman, but nothing more to me than a friend such as any young woman—"

"That settles it! I'll take your word for it, Miss Jenny," broke in Blake, and springing up, he set about his work, whistling.

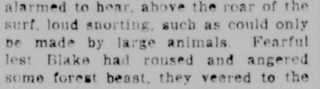
The girl gazed at his broad back and erect head, uncertain whether she should feel relieved or anxious. The more she thought the matter over, the more uncertain she became, and the more she wondered at her uncertainty. Could it be possible that she was becoming interested in a man who, if her ears had not deceived her— But no! That could not be possible!

Yet what a ring there was to his voice!—so clear and tonic after Winthrope's precise, modulated drawl. And her countryman's firmness! He could be rude if need be; but he would make her do what he thought was best for her health. Was it not possible that she had misunderstood his words on the cliff, and so misjudged—wronged—him?—that Winthrope, so eager to stipulate for her hand— But then Winthrope had more than confirmed her dreadful conclusions taken from Blake's words, and Winthrope was an English gentleman—

She ended in a state of utter bewilderment.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Savage Manifest.



AS WINTHROPE had succeeded in dragging himself to and from the headland without a collapse, the following morning, as soon as the dew was dry, Blake called out all hands for the expedition. He was in the best of humors, and showed unexpected consideration by presenting Winthrope with a cane, which he had cut and trimmed during the night.

Having sent Miss Leslie to fill the whisky flask with spring water, he dropped three cocoanut-shell bowls, a piece of meat and a lump of salt into one of the earthenware pots, and slung all over his shoulder in the antelope skin. With his bow hung over the other shoulder, knife and arrows in his belt, and his big club in his hand, he looked ready for any contingency.

"We'll hit first for the mouth of the river," he said. "I'm going on ahead. If I'm not in sight when you come up, pick a tree where the ground is dry, and wait."

"But I say, Blake," replied Winthrope, "I see animals over in the coppices, and you should know that I am physically unable—"

"Nothing but antelope," interrupted Blake. "I've seen them enough now to know them twice as far off. And you can bet on it they'd not be there if any dangerous beast was in smelling distance."

"That is so clever of you, Mr. Blake," remarked Miss Leslie.

"Simple enough when you happen to think of it," responded Blake. "Yes; the only thing you've got to look out for's the ticks in the grass. They'll keep you interested. They bit me up in great shape."

He scowled at the recollection, nodded by way of emphasis, and was off like a shot. The edge of the plain beneath the cliff was strewn with rocks, among which, even with Miss Leslie's help, Winthrope could pick his way but slowly. Before they were clear of the rough ground, they saw Blake disappear among the mangroves.

The ticks proved less annoying than they had apprehended after Blake's warning. But when they approached the mouth of the river, they were alarmed to hear, above the roar of the surf, loud snorting, such as could only be made by large animals. Fearful lest Blake had roused and angered some forest beast, they veered to the right and ran to hide behind a clump of thorns. Winthrope sank down exhausted the moment they reached cover; but Miss Leslie crept to the far end of the thicket and peered around.

"Oh, look here!" she cried. "It's a whole herd of elephants trying to cross the river mouth where we did, and they're being drowned, poor things!"

"Elephants?" panted Winthrope, and he dragged himself forward beside her. "Why, so there are; quite a drove of the beasts. Yet, I must say, they appear smaller—ah, yes; see their heads. They must be the hippos Blake saw."

"Those ugly creatures? I once saw some at the zoo. Just the same, they will be drowned. Some are right in the surf!"

"I can't say, I'm sure, Miss Genevieve, but I have an idea that the beasts are quite at home in the water. I fancy they enjoy surf bathing as keenly as ourselves."

"I do believe you are right. There is one going in from the quiet water. But look at those funny little ones on the backs of the others!"

"Must be the baby hippos," replied Winthrope, indifferently. "If you please, I'll take a pull at the flask. I am very dry."

When he had half emptied the flask, he stretched out in the shade to doze. But Miss Leslie continued to watch the movements of the snorting hippos, amused by the ponderous antics of the grown ones in the surf, and the comic appearance of the barrel-like infants as they mounted the backs of their obese mothers.

Presently Blake came out from among the mangroves, and walked across to the beach, a few yards away from the huge bathers. To all appearances, they paid as little attention to him as he to them. Miss Leslie glanced about at Winthrope. He was fast asleep. She waited a few moments to see if the hippopotami would attack Blake. They continued to ignore him, and gaining courage from their indifference, she stepped out from behind the thicket, and advanced to where Blake was crouched on the beach. When she came up, she saw beside him a heap of oysters, which he was opening in rapid succession.

"Hello! You're just in time to help," he called. "Where's Win?"

"Asleep behind those bushes."

"Worst thing he could do. But lend a hand, and we'll shuck these oysters before rousting him out. You can rinse those I've opened. Fill the pot with water, and put them in to soak."

"They look very tempting. How did you chance to find them?"

"Saw 'em on the mangrove roots at low tide, first time I nosed around here. Tide was well up to-day; but I managed to get these all right with a little diving. Only trouble, the skeets most ate me alive."

Miss Leslie glanced at her companion's dry clothing, and came back to the oysters themselves. "These look very tempting. Do you like them raw?"

"Can't say I like them much any way, as a rule. But if I did, I wouldn't eat this mess raw."

"Yes?"

"This must be the dry season here, and the river is running mighty clear. Just the same it's nothing more than liquid malaria. We'll not eat these oysters till they've been pasteurized."

"If the water is so dangerous, I fear we will suffer before we can return," replied Miss Leslie, and she held up the flask.

"What!" exclaimed Blake. "Half gone already? That was Winthrope."

"He was very thirsty. Could we not boil a potful of the river water?"

"Yes, when the ebb gets strong, if we run too dry. First, though, we'll make a try for cocoanuts. Let's hit out for the nearest grove now. The main thing is to keep moving."

As he spoke, Blake caught up the pot and his club and started for the thorn clump, leaving the skin, together with the meat and the salt, for Miss Leslie to carry. Winthrope was wakened by a touch of Blake's foot, and all three were soon walking away from the seashore, just within the shady border of the mangrove wood.

At the first fan-palm Blake stopped to gather a number of leaves, for their palm-leaf hats were now cracked and broken. A little farther on a ruddy antelope, with lyrate horns, leaped out of the bush before them and dashed off toward the river before Blake could string his bow. As if in mockery of his lack of readiness, a troupe of large green monkeys set up a wild chattering in a tree above the party.

"I say, Miss Jenny, do you think you can lug the pot, if we go slow? It isn't far now."

"Good for you, little woman! That'll give me a chance to shoot quick."

They moved on again for a hundred yards or more; but though Blake kept a sharp lookout both above and below, he saw no game other than a few small birds and a pair of blue wood-pigeons. When he sought to creep up on the latter, they flew into the next tree. In following them, he came upon a conical mound of hard clay, nearly four feet high.

"Hello; this must be one of those white ant-hills," he said, and he gave the mound a kick.

Instantly a tiny object whirred up and struck him in the face.

"Whee!" he exclaimed, springing back and striking out. "A hornet! No; it's a bee!"

"Did it sting you?" cried Miss Leslie.

"Sting? Keep back; there's a lot more of 'em. Sting? Oh, no; he only hypodermicked me with a red-hot darning needle! Shy around here. There's a whole swarm of the little devils, and they're hopping mad. Hear 'em buzz!"

"But where is their hive?" asked Winthrope, as all three drew back behind the nearest bushes.

"Guess they've borrowed that ant-hill," replied Blake, gingerly fingering the white lump which marked the spot where the bee had struck him.

"Wouldn't it be delightful if we had some honey?" exclaimed Miss Leslie.

"By Jove, that really wouldn't be half bad!" chimed in Winthrope.

"Maybe we can, Miss Jenny; only we'll need a fire to tackle those buzzers. Guess it'll be as well to let them cool off a bit also. The cocoanuts are only a little way ahead now. Here; give me the pot."

They soon came to a small grove of cocoanut palms, where Blake threw down his club and bow and handed his burning-glass to Miss Leslie.

"Here," he said; "you and Win start a fire. It's early yet, but I'm thinking we'll all be ready enough for oyster stew."

"How about the meat?" asked Miss Leslie.

"Keep that till later. Here goes for our dessert."

Selecting one of the smaller palms, Blake spat on his hands, and began to climb the slender trunk. Aided by previous experiences, he mounted steadily to the top. The descent was made with even more care and steadiness, for he did not wish to tear the skin from his hands again.

"Now, Win," he said, as he neared the bottom and sprang down, "leave the cooking to Miss Leslie, and husk some of those nuts. You won't more'n have time to do it before the stew is ready."

Winthrope's response was to draw out his penknife. Blake stretched himself at ease in the shade, but kept a critical eye on his companions. Although Winthrope's fingers trembled with weakness, he worked with a precision and rapidity that drew a grunt of approval from Blake. Presently Miss Leslie, who had been stirring the stew with a twig, threw in a little salt, and drew the pot from the fire.

"En avant, gentlemen! Dinner is served," she called gayly.

"What's that?" demanded Blake. "Oh; sure. Hold on, Miss Jenny. You'll dump it all."

He wrapped a wisp of grass about the pot, and filled the three cocoanut bowls. The stew was boiling hot; but they fished up the oysters with the bamboo forks that Blake had carved some days since. By the time the oysters were eaten, the liquor in the bowl was cool enough to drink. The process was repeated until the pot had been emptied of its contents.

"Say, but that was something like," murmured Blake. "If only we'd had pretzels and beer to go with it! But these nuts won't be bad."

When they finished the cocoanuts, Winthrope asked for a drink of water.

"Would it not be best to keep it until later?" replied Miss Leslie.

"Sure," put in Blake. "We've had enough liquid refreshments to do any one. If I don't look out, you'll both be drinking river water. Just bear in mind the work I'd have to carve a pair of gravestones. No; that flask has got to do you till we get home. I don't spin up any more telegraph poles to-day."

"Would it not be best for Mr. Winthrope to rest during the noon hours?"

"'Fraid not, Miss Jenny. We're not on t'other side of Jordan yet, and there's no rest for the weary this side."

"What odd expressions you use, Mr. Blake!"

"Just giving you the reverse application of one of those songs they jolt us with in the mission churches—"

"I'm sure, Mr. Blake—"

"Me, too, Miss Jenny! So, as soon as settled, we'll be moving. Chuck live coals in the pot, and come a—"

He started off, weapons in hand. Winthrope made a languid effort to take possession of the pot. But Miss Leslie pushed him aside, and wrapping all in the antelope skin, slung it upon her back.

"The brute!" exclaimed Winthrope. "To leave such a load for you, when he knew that I can do so little!"

The girl met his outburst with a brave attempt at a smile. "Please try to look at the bright side, Mr. Winthrope. Really, I believe he thinks it is best for us to exert ourselves."

"He has other opinions with which we of the cultured class would hardly agree, Miss Leslie. Consider his command that we shall go thirsty until he permits us to return to the cliffs. The man's impertinence is intolerable. I shall go to the river and drink when I choose."

"Oh, but the danger of malaria!"

"Nonsense. Malaria, like yellow fever, comes only from the bite of certain species of mosquitoes. If we have the fever, it will be entirely his fault. We have been bitten repeatedly this morning, and all because he must compel us to come with him to this infected lowland."

"Still, I think we should do what Mr. Blake says."

"My dear Miss Genevieve, for your sake I will endeavor not to break with the fellow. Only, you know, it is deuced hard to keep one's temper when one considers what a bounder—what an unmitigated cad—"

"Stop! I will not listen to another word!" exclaimed the girl, and she hurried after Blake, leaving Winthrope staring in astonishment.

"My word!" he muttered; "can it be, after all I've done—and him, of all the low fellows—"

He stood for several moments in deep thought. The look on his sallow face was far from pleasant.

Are you willing to forget what you have done for other people, and to remember what other people have done for you? Then you can keep Christmas.—Henry Van Dyke.

Wisdom.

Wisdom does not show itself so much in precept as in life—in a firmness of mind and mastery of appetite. It teaches us to do, as well as to talk; and to make our actions and words all of a color.—Seneca.

Grass of Great Strength.

A steel-like grass which grows on the volcanic slopes of Oran, Algeria, is so elastic and strong that it can be used instead of springs in the manufacture of furniture.

New Fishes in the Sea.

In a communication to the Royal Society of Queensland, Douglas Ogilby records the discovery of one new genus and seven new species of fish. Among these are slender dog shark, Howe's needle fish, long-beaked garfish, the somber leather jacket and others.

Pygmies of East Africa.

The thick forest along the banks of the Semliki, in eastern Africa, is densely inhabited by pygmies. They are cannibals, and when pressed for food exchange their children for those of other families. They refuse to eat members of their own families.

Good Breeding.

A scholar without good breeding is a pedant; the philosopher, a cynic; the soldier, a brute; and every man, disagreeable.—Chesterfield.

Lay Hold of the Common Good.

If men have the presumption of those who claim a reputation to which they have no right, they equally condemn the faint-heartedness of those who fall below the glory which is their own. Lose, then, the sense of your private sorrows and lay hold of the common good!—Demosthenes.

Division of Labor.

A man's better-half lays down the rules in the house, but allows her husband to lay down the carpets.

Nearest Perpetual Motion.

The man who invented the gas meter has just died. He takes his place as coming the nearest to date to solving the problem of perpetual motion.—Hartford Courant.

What Roosevelt Will See

And on the other side of the world some folks are overdue. One of these is that restless spirit who means to step from the White House into hunting togs and to pursue in Africa the big game that abounds in its equatorial region.

This hunting of big game has a double fascination. There is the fascination that all big game hunters confess to—the danger of it for one thing, and which to many is lure alone. Some of these hardy ones who live on the excitement that it supplies have likened it to the taking of opium or the imbibing of strong waters—a habit that grows until, as in the case of the hunter, there is no animal too formidable and no jungle too thick. That is one side of the fascination that it holds. The other is for the stay-at-homes and who follow big game hunting by reading about it.

These may find some solace in reading of the preparations which President Roosevelt is making for himself and his party of the weapons which will be carried, of the camp equipage and of the game that may be encountered.

The tents that are being provided for Mr. Roosevelt and party are of green waterproof silk—a material so light in texture that an entire tent with its telescoping pole weighs only 73 ounces. It is essential that its color be green, this because of the fact that a rhinoceros, reckoned by big game hunters as the most dangerous and vicious of all wild animals, will charge a white tent the moment he sees it, no matter if the tent were surrounded by a whole caravan of attendents. One can imagine the restless slumber of a hunter who goes to sleep with the knowledge that he might have his life crushed out at any moment by the infuriated charge of one of these vicious animals.

Besides being of a color which will not invite such attack, it is also essential that the tent be insect proof. Africa is infested with many kinds of poisonous insects, and while hunters guard against their bites by day, yet, without an absolutely insect-proof tent to sleep in o'nights the white man who seeks big game in Africa is liable to be bitten by some of these numerous poisonous insects. But the tents that are being prepared for Mr. Roosevelt are said to be proof against the tiniest things that crawls or flies.

The pole that goes with the tent is made of bicycle steel tubing. It is of a telescopic pattern, weighs only three pounds and can be extended to a height of eight feet. Each tent will accommodate four persons. The hunters will sleep on pneumatic mattresses. These, when deflate, can be rolled up in a bundle no larger than a blanket. Very light Hudson bay blankets will be furnished with each mattress.

A dealer is furnishing the arms and ammunition, but from another source it was learned that the president and his party will be equipped with the 405 Winchester, a weapon of extremely high power and very flat trajectory. Some idea of the extent of its shocking power may be had from the statement that the impact of its bullet is equivalent to the lifting of 3,007 pounds one foot. The bullets are soft pointed, which means that they will "mushroom" on hitting. This it the kind of bullet that makes only a small hole when entering the side of an animals, but "mushrooming" on impact, cuts on its exit a hole sometimes as large as a cocoanut.

But the chief reliance for jungle work is likely to be the double-barrel English express rifle. This rifle ranges in weight from 10 to 18 pounds, with a bore of .577 of an inch in diameter. While it is not positively known that the president and his party will be equipped with these rifles, yet it is more than likely that they will be, since all of the big game hunters unanimously agree that it is the most dependable of all weapons when at close quarters with big game. But even this formidable double-barreled piece is sometimes inadequate to meet the sudden exigencies of big game hunting in Africa.

One of the most indefatigable of all the big game hunters, and who had hunted Africa from one end to the other, recently gave it as his opinion that the rhinoceros is by far the most dangerous animal that can be found in the dark continent. "In Equatorial Africa," he said, "you will find the rhinoceros almost everywhere, in the high land and in the low land, in the open country and in the brush. You will find him when you least expect him and most often when you do not want to see him. He is a vicious and heavily armored beast, almost the exact color of the earth which you find out in that sunbaked region, and when stalking through his habitat, wholly unconscious of his presence, you suddenly hear his 'chug, chug!' then God help you if you are not provided with a rifle of large caliber and carrying steel bullets.

"You will want some steel in your nerves, too, for the brute usually weighs about 3,000 pounds, and his rush is like that of a locomotive. Now, your rifle may be of the biggest caliber, and your bullets of the hardest steel, but no matter how many you pump at him you could no more stop his rush by this means than a popgun would stop a battleship. The heaviest of steel bullets could not reach a vital spot after going through that great bone snout, and it would require an extra hard one to cut through it at all. Your only chance is to do a swift side step, and even then you have only three shots that will count—the brain, the neck and the heart shot. When he charges head on it is impossible to reach any one."

The president's present plans contemplate a journey to Alexandria by the North German Lloyd line and thence to Mombasa, the capital of British East Africa, probably by one of the vessels of the German East Africa line. From Mombasa the party will travel by the Uganda railway to Lake Victoria Nyanza and, crossing that stretch of water by steamer, will seek the plateau of the Uganda, and where abounds more game than can be found anywhere else in the world.

But along the railway route from Mombasa to the lake plenty of game is to be fouud. One who recently made the journey, thus describes it:

"Some three or four travelers how leaves the train and make their way to the dark bungalow, and by the look of their impedimente they are evidently sportsmen bent on big game shooting. And they have chosen their stopping place well, for here commences the vast sweep of country stretching up to the forests of Kikuyu, than which, perhaps, there it no place in the world more calculated to delight the heart of a sportsman. This Makindu district makes an ideal shooting country. The game is not perhaps so plentiful as in the Athi Plains, which we shall see by and by, but here we have excellent natural cover, which enables one to practice perfection the art of stalking, that the most necessary of accomplishments for a successful hunter.

"The open bush, relieved by lofty trees, provides a succession of surprises to the hunter. Now a bush buck will start up and bound away; now we catch sight through the foliage of the graceful horns of the stately water buck as he crops the herbage all unconscious of impending danger. In the open glades we shall probably see a herd of massive eland, or perhaps, the oryx, with their almost zebra-like markings and tapering horns.

"The delicate looking mpala is also sure to be seen bounding gracefully along, while the chance of coming on rhinoceros or lion will lend extra excitement to our walk. In fact, our friends will be poor shots indeed if they do not account for some of this selection.

"We wish them luck, and taking our seats again as we hear the whistle of the train, we throw away books and papers, as we want to see all we can for the next hundred miles or so through the thick of the game country, and there is no doubt that we could see the like from the windows of no other railroad carriage in the world.

"The plains are also the habitat of the huge African rhinoceros, who hunts his enemy by scent, and is extremely short sighted, so that on several occasions he has tried conclusions with the railway engine, much to his discomfiture Giraffe, warthogs, jackals, hyenas and a host of other four-footed beasts, cranes and bustards and other feathered varieties all help to swell the population of the animal kingdom.

"The lion, too, is still in evidence, as we notice by the flocks of vultures soaring in the air in the distance ready to pick the bones of his latest kill."

There is no closed season in Africa on lions, leopards and crocodiles, and of these the president and his party may shoot as many as they like. But, having declined the offer of a special permit, extended by the British Colonial office, the ordinary license, which the president will take out on his arrival at Mombasa, will restrict him and each member of his party to the following:

Two male elephants, two rhinoceroses, ten hippotami, 21 antelope, including two kudos; ten wild pigs, ten smaller cats, ten jackals, two gembok, and one bongo; two zebras, two cheetahs, two aard wolves, ten chevrotains, two colobi or other fur monkeys, two marabou storks, two ostriches, two egrets and one chimpanzee.

He will be forbideen to shoot giraffes, wild asses, eland, mountain zebra, female or young elephants, vultures of any species, saddle-billed storks, whaleheaded storks, crowned cranes, okapi, female buffalo, female or young ostriches and Speke's tragetaphus female.

EFFECTIVE TOWN BEAUTIFUL

Good That Can be Done by an Advisory Committee.

Some large towns realizing that all of their voters were not in a position to obtain information concerning the business of the towns, have adopted the expedient of an advisory committee. This committee is composed of some twenty to forty representative men, whose duty it is to make a thorough examination of the business of the town and the needs for the coming year and report to the entire voting body its findings and recommendations. In that way the voters have laid before them in print an explanation of the public business, a lucid statement of the purposes for which money must be provided and recommendations concerning changes or improvements.

Therein is a hint for civic bodies in places where the town has not such a committee. No better work can be done than the work of investigation and publication. The great majority of voters in the United States are in the dark as to what is going on in public business and do not know how to vote except as they are told by the politicians. If they could have authoritative information from time to time they would take interest and there would be an improvement in municipal business. Then the civic club can extend its operations to the improvement of its transportation facilities, to its sanitation, to the elimination of grade crossing, to the abatement of the smoke nuisance and a multitude of other good things for its town, all of which will profit the place in hard dollars. The club may even devote a part of its time and strength to the selection of good men for office and the attempt to elect them.

THE CHURCH—WHAT IS LACKING.

Hundreds of men and women in every community are staying away from church services and there are hundreds of others who are regular attendants who come away unsatisfied. We know the stock argument that many stay away from the churches because there are so many inconsistent church members, but this argument is weak at best. The church is not composed of saints, but of sinners, and the more one realizes his need of God and his own frailty, the more valuable does the work of the church become to him. It is the business of the church to arouse men to their need and then to minister to that need intelligently. It is a grand theory to honor God by attending public worship, but it is a grander thing for the church to deal with the individual need as well as with men enmasse. The music, the prayer, the sermon, are all helpful and uplifting, but what about the man with a heavy load, or carrying within his bosom some secret sin, or grappling with a mighty temptation? The church services are orderly and beautiful, but should not the impression made at a particular service, or the kindling of a desire for help or guidance be followed up and clinched? We see much much practical wisdom in the methods of Dr. Worcester, of Boston, and the so-called "Emmanuel Movement," although we do not care to adopt this plan in toto. He supplies what is lacking in many churches by following the services with an invitation for all who need help or advice to meet him in a room provided and tell him about it. Some are sick in body as well as soul and to those a Christian physician of broad sympathy as well as medical skill co-operates with the minister. This practical aid is bringing thousands to that church and wonderful are the results. The Boston minister's methods may not be feasible for country churches but he is supplying a good need in getting next to the individual and reaping at each service the fruit of his sowing.

LINCOLN.

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln occurs tomorrow and the day will be observed throughout the United States in a manner befitting so important an event The Governor of Maryland, at the request of prominent citizens has proclaimed the day a legal holiday and in the city of Baltimore and throughout the State public meetings will be held to do honor to his memory. The G. A. R. has also prepared a special order of exercises. As the years go by the man and his great services to the nation are more and more appreciated. Born amid humble surroundings Lincoln early took an interest in public affairs and by hard work overcame his lack of early educational advantages. In the stirring times before the war his great power before the people as a public speaker was fully demonstrated in his debates with Douglass, the polished orator. He was the great advocate of the common people and when he was nominated and elected to the Presidency with the cloud of the Civil War hovering over the country, no man was more anxious for peace. But the issues could only be settled by the arbitrament of war and in the great conflict for the preservation of the Union, Lincoln addressed himself with a resolute but a sad heart. There was no malice in his heart, nothing save an unutterable sorrow that brother should be arrayed against brother. He never forgot that we are one people—North and South—and that the obligation of his office and the future glory of the Republic lay in the preservation of the Union states. Just as success came he suffered death at the hands of an assassin. "Strange we do not prize the music till the sweet voiced bird has flown, strange that summer skies and sunshine never seem one-half so fair as when winter's snowy pinions shake the white down through the air."

At his death the country awoke to its great loss, to a realization of the great heart and character of the man and to his inestimable service to the nation. His name in these few short years is written large in the hall of fame and North and South bear testimony to the noble qualities of the man. In all the years the memory of this plain, quiet, simple-hearted man will be revered by our children and our children's children.

THE AMENDMENT DISSECTED.

In the speeches made at Collector Stone's dinner to the Republican editors the suffrage amendment was thoroughly dissected, so much so that no feature of it can possibly be used by its promoters to delude any voters who read with intelligent interest the arraingment of the measure made by Secretary Bonaparte, State Senator Putzel and others. By this time the nefarious measure has been so exposed that it has no more capacity for collecting votes than a sieve has for holding water. It has been reprobated from one end of the nation to the other. It has been held up to censure by prominent persons, including Mr. Taft, and it has been pointed to with scorn by almost as many persons of Democratic persuasion as of Republican.

No proposition in the history of the state has been so thoroughly discredited as the Poe measure which was subtly contrived for the defeat of political rights, for the deception of voters, for the inauguration of an orgy of partisan rule. The present measure is its counterpart. Secretary Bonaparte very aptly showed the pernicious effects of the measure when he said: "With the amendment in force we could not have elected the new judges in 1882; we could not have rejected the call for a constitutional amendment in 1887, and again in 1907; we could not have elected Lloyd Lowndes in 1895; we could not have defeated Bryan in 1896, and again in 1900; we could not have rejected the Poe amendment in 1905." So much for the wide-sweeping political effect of the measure that professes to make this state a "white man's state," while in fact it would make the state a Democratic state, abounding with the black deeds of partisan insolence.

State Senator Putzel well said that the measure would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States; that it would debase political conditions in the state; that it is unfair in its provisions. It is, in fact, but a tissue of pretense, a bundle of lies and sheaf of deceits. In this nature it appears to the voters and they will not tolerate for a moment its passage. The circumstance that Maryland has a large alien-born population that might be affected by the property and educational clauses, no matter how well framed the amendment may be to not run afoul of this element, the fact that its rank discriminations would make it odious from every point of view of the national Constitution, gives to the measure particularly sinister significance. But there are other aspects of the amendment that are not commonly dwelt upon.

It is to be borne in mind that the conditions that the promoters of the amendment avow as its defense are to be found in not more than eight counties of the state; that is a very large colored voting element, enough to be a determining factor. The measure is not based upon majority sentiment, it is not based upon preponderating geographical needs; it seeks to drag the state into bondage for a few counties. The eight counties where the conditions exist that give any basis for such an amendment include but a small percentage of the voting population. Shall the state be shackled to party because a mere fraction of the white population conceive their political interests to be unduly affected by the colored vote? The plea is preposterous.

Moreover, it is a fact that in the Southern States with restricted suffrage the Maryland amendment is looked upon with ill favor. These states see that because of the peculiar features of the Maryland measure it must come before the supreme Court of the United States for interpretation, and these states fear that the result of passing upon the Maryland measure will be a declaration by the highest tribunal ruling out all amendments aimed at the colored voter as being inimicable to the Fifteenth Amendment. So that even in its own household the Maryland amendment is not honored. It is everywhere looked upon as a bird of ill omen except by the few political ringsters who clamor for it in their lust for political spoils. It is a spoilation measure, pure and simple. The Republican party is doing fine service to all the citizenship of the state by leading in the valiant work or effecting its defeat.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

The semi-monthly session of the Orphans' Court was held Tuesday with the full bench present, when the following business was transacted:

Letters testamentary were granted Robert C. and Ernest Townshend on the estate of their recently deceased mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Townshend; also to W. E. Georg on the estate of Catharine Georg.

Letters of administration were granted Gilead Broadwater, d. b. n., on the estate of William C. Broadwater and Mrs. Elizabeth Frazee on the personal estate of her deceased husband, Jasper Frazee.

The bonds of Sheriff Brown and Deputy Sheriff Claude Brown were presented and approved by the Court.

Mrs. Elmer Haulenbeek's little son has been quite sick in Baltimore.

DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARY A. ENGLE.

At her residences in Deer Park, Maryland, 1.45 o'clock a. m., January 31st, 1909, Mrs. Mary A. Engle, devoted wife of Mr. Walter Engle. The subject of this sketch was the twin sister of Mr. William D. Hoye, a widely known Justice of the Peace in Garrett, and born at the ancestral homestead "Hoyesburg," near the popular old hostelery, Fort Pendleton. Here upon the revered grounds of her ancesters, and border territory between the clashing armies of the civil war, passed the sunny girlhood of Mrs. Engle's life. At the termination of hostilities she moved with the family of her widowed mother to a farm in close proximity to Oakland. After seven years in this new home, she was happily united in marriage to Mr. Walter Engle in the year 1879, and soon after the consummation of this union she accompanied her husband to his distant home at Preston, Minnesota, where twenty-seven years of their married life was spent, before their return East to the present abode in Deer Park. This Deer Park cottage embraced the comforts of a well-ordered house, the seat of undisturbed happiness and warm hospitality until the sunlight at its door vanished in the shadow of this sudden death leaving a bereaved husband to walk alone the short remainder of the slope of life solaced by memories dear to him. The more our poor human vision is permitted to penetrate the hidden mysteries of the one tomorrow in contemplation of the realms of peace the more clearly we understand that—

"There is no death! An angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best loved things away,
And we call them dead."

At the threshold of her early career Mrs. Engle carefully laid the foundation of her subsequent pure and strictly regulated life by uniting with the Methodist church and by keeping the the faith loyally to the end. The charms of superior womanhood blended pleasingly in her character and shone so winsomely in her happy face as to attract friends and challenge interest among all clases. It should comfort to remember that while life's tide ebbed away ministrations were tenderly rendered by three of her most cherished friends, Mrs. Oliver B. Jones, wife of merchant W. C. Jones; Mrs. Rachel E. Laughlin, and Mrs. Mary C. Hennen, wife of William W. Hennen, engineer B. & O. R. R. These mortal offices devotedly performed were exceeded by immortal intercession mercifully relieving the disolution from even an appear of pain or pang. The fatal stroke came while she was in her usual health and lively spirits, and at the beckon of an unseen hand the silver cord was gently loosened for a noiseless flight to the upper realms. Who would alter such an end—"For so He giveth His beloved sleep." RELLIM.

The following mentions of interment have been forwarded with request for publication:

J. H. Markwood, Esq., of Keyser, W. Va., and Wm. W. Hennen, assisting, undertakers. Active pallbearers: John D. Engle, of Minneapolis; Newton Engle, of Chicago, Ill.; Samuel P. Specht, Oscar J. Harvey, Frank A. Thrasher, Dr. James E. Hurley. Honorary pallbearers: George W. Lohm, Ev. Lutheran; Rev. W H. Clary, U. B.; Edward G. Miller, M. E.; Wilber C. Jones, M. E.; John Snider, Baptist; William L. Shaffer, Baptist, Patrick J. Garrett, Catholic; William B. Griffin, Catholic, and Charles A. Ashby, M. E.

A TRIBUTE BY JOHN D. ENGLE, OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

From the day mother crossed the threshold of the distant Minnesota farmhouse in April, 1879, to the time she penned the lines to the undersigned just before she was stricken with that fatal malady, she occupied the most conspicuous place in the hearts of the six boys and two girls that composed the family of the bereaved husband.

Our family had been broken up by the death of our mother, and when the mother entered it a total stranger she found seven unruly half-grown children; but when she entered love entered. One of her traits in advancing the happiness of her new family was to look beyond the gratification of the present moment and consult their ultimate improvement, requiring all the members of her household to bear their part toward that end.

Having borne no children of her own she devoted her energies to the care of father's children in such a manner as to win the affection of each and all. Thus through sickness and through health, through the joys and festivities of marriage ceremonies or the dark hours of sorrow at the death that entered the parent home on one occasion, would some member of the household or the two or three members of the family, her ministrations were most helpful and her sympathy most profound. She did not stop with the performance of the simple functions of a housekeeper, but her precept and example led each of the eight children under her charge out into broader fields and on higher ground morally, socially and spiritually.

For years it has been a common experience of the different members of the family, now grown to manhood and womanhood, to point with pride to a step-mother whose memory they wished to cherish and whose name they wished to honor; each one finding that companionship strong as a guiding element and as dear as that of a lover or sweetheart. This appreciation was heightened by the very tender solicitude she always had for the dear father who had bravely met the trials that beset his pathway and who on that account needed the wise council and loving association of a mother in the home who had the welfare of all uppermost in her mind. In this particular she had won the admiration not only of the members of the family but of the neighbors as well. Day by day and year by year she watched over her husband with a solicitude that knew no bounds, with a care that was painful if separated from him, with an intentness that left no vigil at random and with a tenderness that strewed his pathway with blessing and contentment.

She was frugal, industrious and business like. When she came into the family she found a rather heavy mortgage on the farm and other small debts to be paid. She set to work systematically to clear up all these obligations. When she died this was all accomplished. She passed away leaving a comfortable bank account, a nice home an income more than sufficient to furnish her husband a competence during the remainder of his declining years.

Time is the great vanquisher of men, but there are men who, stronger than time, live on through the ages constraining successive generations to bow at the shrine of immortality. This and more was once said of a great man, and in an humbler way we will love to think of this dear departed mother as having left with us a memory of deeds well done and a life well spent in a service for others which will not only be helpful to remember but to recount to our children and friends who may not be able to share with us the companionship we have enjoyed the past many years.

"Night and the dawn, bright day and thoughtful eve,
As one great mystic instrument, are touched
By an unseen, living hand, and conscious cords
Quiver with joy in the great jubilee,
They dying hear it; and as sounds of earth
Grow dull and distant, wake their souls
To mingle in this heavenly harmony."

The tribute here presented from the children of Walter Engle is written by one of them but embraces the sentiments expressed in various ways by all during our thirty years' acquaintance with this woman who has so endeared herself to us and whose memory will inspire us to nobler deeds and higher aims as the years come and go.

JOHN D. ENGLE.

CHARLES T. WEST.

Died, in Baltimore on Tuesday afternoon, after an illness of several months, Charles T. West, a life-long and prominent resident of Swanton, this county, where he was engaged in the general mercantile business for many years. Mr. West, until last fall, continued to reside in Swanton, when, owing to continued ill health he was taken to Baltimore by his family for treatment. He was advanced in years.

WILLIAM A. DEWITT

William A. DeWitt, aged nearly thirty-two years, died at the home of his sister, Mrs. W. A. Maffett, in Oakland, on Tuesday afternoon of this week, after a prolonged illness as a result of an attack of pneumonia. Mr. DeWitt was taken ill at his home in Cranesville several weeks ago and on last Friday, in order to receive the proper medical treatment, he was brought to his sister's residence in Oakland. While the journey from Cranesville to Oakland was very trylng to the sick man as well as his many friends, he stood the trip exceedingly well and hopes were entertained for his ultimate recovery until on Monday when a surgical operation was made necessary to relieve the plural cavity. The operation was successfully performed but the weakened condition of Mr. DeWitt was against him and he died as a result of the shock. He leaves five brothers and two sisters and a great many friends. His funeral services will be conducted in St. Peter's Catholic church tomorrow morning and interment will be made at Hoyes where his father and mother lie buried.

Notice to Delinquent Renters of Garrett County Telephone Company.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Garrett County Telephone Company, held at Hoyes, Md., Dec. 17, 1908, the following motion was made and adopted by the Board as a whole: That all parties who are in arrears with their rents to the amount of six months that if they are not paid by the 1st day of March, 1909, they will be placed in the proper officers' hands for collection.

Mr. N. U. Bond was in the city this morning an hour or two on business.

Mr. E. H. Sincell, who was confined to his home for ten days, has recovered.

Dr. Henry W. McComas went to Washington, D. C., yesterday on business.

Miss Margaret Sollars left Oakland Monday for a month's visit to Baltimore and Winchester, W. Va.

Mr. William T. White, of Terra Alta, was in Oakland last Friday as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Scott T. Jones.

Mr. Gustave Wagner and daughter Miss Eva, of Ogden, Mich., are visiting Mr. W.'s sister, Mrs. George Giessman, at the Giessman House.

Mr. Jonas Hetrick, a former resident of the Bittinger district, but for several years past residing in Savage, Pa., was in Oakland last Thursday on business.

Mr. F. W. Chase, manager of the Glade View Stock Farm, near Oakland, left here last Friday night for a ten days' visit to his old home in Philadelphia.

Miss Corinne Manges, who spent two weeks visiting friends and relatives in Washington, D. C., and York, Pa., returned to her home in Oakland Monday afternoon.

Mr. Gilead Broadwater, of near Grantsville, was a business visitor to Oakland Tuesday when he was appointed administrator of the estate of his father, the late William Broadwater.

Mr. H. E. F. Hinebaugh, one of the prominent and successful business men of Thomas, W. Va., spent a day or two last week in Oakland as the guest of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hinebaugh.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Stull, who left Oakland early in the fall, going to Wilkesbarre, Pa., are now at the Valencia Hotel, St. Augustine, Florida, where they expect to spend the remainder of the winter.

J. A. DeWitt, the real estate man, with offices in the First National Bank building, was called to Oakland, Md., this morning by the death of his brother, William DeWitt.—Connellsville News, Feb. 10.

Mr. Carl B. White, of the Dixon & Kelso store, has been confined to his home since Saturday with an abcess on his instep and at times has suffered greatly. This morning his condition is somewhat improved.

During the high wind which prevailed in Oakland last Saturday morning a high brick chimney on the office building recently vacated by the Supervisors of Elections, on Second street, was blown down and crashed out onto the pavement.

Rev. Yugel, of the Bittinger Lutheran church, and ex-Sheriff Andrew J. Oester, of Bittinger, were in Oakland last Friday on business connected with the proposed building of two new Lutheran churches in the Bittinger country, one to be located at Fort Hill and the other at Jennings. The two buildings will be identical in arrangement and their cost will be about $2,000. At both places where the churches are to be erected Rev. Yugel has aroused the people to action and indications are that large memberships will result.

A number of Bittinger residents were in Oakland last Thursday and Friday as witnesses and principals in a case in the Equity Court when testimony was taken before Mr. W. R. Offutt, the Court examiner. Among those who were interested in the case were Messrs. Henry and George Wiley and C. J. Brenneman.

Prof. O. H. Bruce and Dr. H. M. Dellinger, of Westernport, were in Oakland Tuesday evening when they installed the recently elected officers of the Oakland Lodge of Masons, Prof. Bruce being the District Inspector and Dr. Dellinger his assistant on this occasion. After the installation ceremonies an hour or more was pleasantly spent around the festive board by the members of the Craft, the visiting brethren returning to their homes the same night on No. 4. The officers installed by the Inspector were: R. E. Sliger, Master; J. C. Renninger, S. W.; A. T. Matthews, J. W.; B. F. Selby, Sec'y; E. J. Fringer, Treasurer; B. H. Sincell, S. D.; A. D. Naylor, J. D., and E. Baumgartner, Tyler.

Two of the members of the Allegany county Board of County Commissioners, Lloyd Durst, Esq., of Lonaconing, and Adam Lebeck, Esq., of Westernport, spent last Friday in Oakland inspecting our new county buildings, especially the jail, the gentlemen having been delegated by their fellow commissioners to come here and give the latter building a thorough examination with a view of erecting one similar to it in Cumberland. The Allegany county Commissioners were very much impressed with both court house and jail and stated that the Garrett county buildings were superior in every respect to those in their home county. Referring to the Garrett county court house Mr. Durst said that the building in Oakland, while smaller than the Cumberland court house, afforded much more room as every inch of available space had been utilized to good advantage and not given up to large corridors as in the Allegany county building. The gentlemen thoroughly enjoyed their visit to Oakland and returned to their respective homes in the afternoon.

The Champion Stock Company, one of the the largest and best repertoire attractions traveling, will fill an entire week's engagement at the Oakland Opera House, starting Monday night, February 15th. As this is the best company of the kind that ever appeared here and as Oakland people only want the best in the amusement line this will be quite a treat, and no doubt large houses will greet the company, which includes over 14 clever players. A different play will be given each night including all the late New York successes and between the acts high class specialty and vaudeville numbers are given, making the performance one continuous round of applause. Popular prices, 20 and 30 cents, will prevail throughout the engagement. Among the pieces to be presented are: "A Fight for Honor," "When Women Love," "Heart of Alabama," "In Washington," "A Gambler's Wife," "Millionaire's Son," "Adrift in New York," and "Cozy Corners." The company goes from here to Fairmont and then plays in Wheeling and Charleston.

Dr. J. Lee McComas, Now in Baltimore, Tells of Oakland Long Ago.

"I am not an octogenarian quite, but I can tell you enough interesting stories of things that happened in Maryland over fifty years ago to fill a volume," said that noted practitioner, Dr. J. Lee McComas, of Oakland, Md., at the Eutaw House.

"Oakland, when I located there in 1858, although it then had some reputation as a health resort, had only ten houses. I had gone there from Baltimore, my native place, to practice medicine, having received my degree at the University of Maryland. My fondness was for surgery, which I learned under that grand old operator, Dr. Nathan R. Smith, chief surgeon of the medical department. Western Maryland, in 1858, would have been the delight of Theodore Roosevelt. All about Oakland, which was then in Allegany county, were wild, wooded tracts, through which deer, bears, panthers and wild cats roamed. Venison retailed at four cents a pound, and many a fat pheasant and woodcock have I bought for ten cents, the seller thinking in his secret heart that he had cheated me.

"In the summer of 1859 I had a noted man for a patient, Jefferson Davis, United States Senator from Mississippi and later on President of the Confederate States. He was in bad shape physically, and was accompanied by Mrs. Davis and their three children. A doctor came with them from Washington, and I could see Mrs. Davis' look of suspicion and distrust as the doctor (who had to leave at once) committed the senator to the hands of a youthful and seemingly inexperienced country physician. However, I was lucky enough to effect a complete cure for my patient. When he asked me for his bill and I told him $30, I well recollect that he was not at all pleased and asked me if that was not a steep charge for a country doctor. My answer was that it was much less than a city M. D. would have assessed him and that no city man could have done more than I did—that is, cured him. This put Senator Davis in a good humor and he paid me three ten-dollar gold pieces, which I have yet. Later on, after secession had been accomplished, he commissioned a mutual friend to offer me a place, of much honor and dignity, in his personal entourage."—Baltimore American.

Grand Minstrel Show

The members of the Mountain City Band, assisted by several persons of local talent, will on February 22nd, present a grand minstrel show for the benefit of their organization. Elaborate preparations are under way for this entertainment and the affair promises to be the best effort in the way of local minstrelsy ever presented in this city. The program will consist of a grand opening chorus and first part by the entire company, and all the latest comic jokes by the end men. There will also be a second part of several side-splitting farces, buck and wing dancing, together with numerous instrumental and vocal solos and quartettes. A grand street parade will occur at noon and the band will give a concert in front of the opera house in the evening. The prices of admission will be very reasonable—25, 35 and 50c. Come one and all and encourage in a substantial way an organization that is fast becoming a credit to the city. Tickets on sale at Harned's drug store.

JUDGE FITZWATER WILL RESIGN.

Owing to Ill Health He Is Forced to Quit the Orphans' Court Bench.

Chief Judge John L. Fitzwater of the Orphans' Court for Garrett county, will shortly forward his resignation to Governor Crothers to take immediate effect, continued ill health being Judge Fitzwater's reason for resigning his office.

Judge Fitzwater was elected less than two years ago for a term of six years and was nominated Chief Judge by Governor Crothers.

For a number of years Judge Fitzwater has been a continual sufferer with facial cancer and up to a very short time ago he had hopes of being cured or the progress of the disease arrested. A recent visit, however, to a New York specialist, resulted in giving Judge Fitzwater no encouragement that his condition would improve even after an operation had been performed when a small growth was removed from beneath his right eye. A more serious operation entailing the removal of the left eye and all that portion of his face contiguous thereto, was suggested by the surgeon operating upon Judge Fitzwater, but he dissented and returned to his home at Swanton a few days thereafter.

No collection.

Approach of Lent.

Ash Wednesday this year falls on February 24, and is the beginning of the Lenten season. Six weeks from the following Sunday will be Easter, April 11 Society has two weeks in which to participate in winter joys before the penitential season arrives and in this stated period much can be accomplished. This winter has been a busy one from a social standpoint, and it looks as though it will be quite gay for the next two weeks.

Unlawfully Detained in Jail.

James R. McKenzie, through his attorney, Charles G. Watson, has petitioned the court for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that John W. McKenzie, of Garrett county, is unlawfully detained by Sheriff Hodel in the Allegany county jail. The petition further avers that said John W. McKenzie had a hearing before Justice Chambers at Lonaconing on the charge of felonious assault, and that at said hearing there was no evidence on which to hold the said McKenzie for the action of the grand jury, but that the said McKenzie was held anyway.

Judge Henderson has signed an order making the writ returnable at 9:30 o'clock Friday.

Sales Advertised.

In this paper today will be found the advertisement of ex County Treasurer Horace R. DeWitt, giving notice of the sale of a large number of pieces of real estate for the non-payment of taxes due and in arrear. The sale will occur at the front door of the new court house on Saturday, March 6th, at two o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Julius C. Renninger is the legal representative of Mr. DeWitt.

Selling Out to Quit Business.

As I am going to Montana to locate in the spring, (not later than May 1st), am selling out my entire stock at a great reduction. A large line of watches, clocks and all kinds of solid gold and gold filled jewelry, cut glass, bric-a-brac, eye glasses, manicure sets, etc., to be disposed of. Also a good Mosler safe, weight about 5300 pounds, and all of my fixtures.

Licenses have been issued by Clerk Tower to the following parties since our last report:

Benjamin Franklin Savage, of Friendsville, and Clara Hileman, of Confluence, Pa.

Harry Margroff and Sarah Alice Becket, of Cove.

James Hartford Watson, of Manningtton, W. Va., and Jessie Ellen Hardy, of Keyser, W. Va.

Sullivan Yocco and Myrtle Harvey, of Berryburg, W. Va.

Charles Straley and Clara Boylen, of Jane Lew, W. Va.

Harvey Knapp and Florence Mary Gibson, of West Newton, Pa.

One with request not to publish.

One license was refused on account of the applicant and groom-elect being under age, the parties being from Parkersburg.

Livery Removed.

Messrs. Maroney Bros., the Quality Hill liverymen, have removed from their old location to the Helbig barn which was recently vacated by Mr J. A. Kelly. The equipment of the Maroney Bros. stable compares very favorably with that of other liverymen and they aim to please their patrons.

UNIFORM PROGRESS IN COUNTRY LIFE

DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT

In Special Message to Congress President Roosevelt Urges That Social as Well as Productive Side of Farm Life Must Be Built Up—Recommendation of Work That Should Be Undertaken by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Washington.—Accompanying the report of the commission on country life the president sent to congress a special message on the subject. The document follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives: I transmit herewith the report of the commission on country life. At the outset I desire to point out that not a dollar of the public money has been paid to any commissioner for his work on the commission.

The report shows the general condition of farming life in the open country, and points out its larger problems; it indicates ways in which the government, national and state, may show the people how to solve some of these problems; and it suggests a continuance of the work which the commission began.

Judging by 30 public hearings, to which farmers and farmers' wives from 40 states and territories came, and from 120,000 answers to printed questions sent out by the department of agriculture, the commission finds that the general level of country life is high compared with any preceding time or with any other land. If it has in recent years slipped down in some places, it has risen in more places. Its progress has been general, if not uniform.

Yet farming does not yield either the profit or the satisfaction that it ought to yield, and may be made to yield. There is discontent in the country, and in places discouragement. Farmers as a class do not magnify their calling, and the movement to the towns, though, I am happy to say, less than formerly, is still strong.

Under our system, it is helpful to promote discussion of ways in which the people can help themselves. There are three main directions in which the farmers can help themselves; namely, better farming, better business, and better living on the farm. The national department of agriculture, which has rendered service equaled by no other similar department in any other time or place; the state departments of agriculture; the state colleges of agriculture and the mechanical arts, especially through their extension work; the state agricultural experiment stations; the Farmers' union; the Grange; the agricultural press; and other similar agencies; have all combined to place within the reach of the American farmer an amount and quality of agricultural information, which, if applied, would enable him, over large areas, to double the production of the farm.

For Better Business and Living.

The object of the commission on country life, therefore, is not to help the farmer raise better crops, but to call his attention to the opportunities for better business and better living on the farm. If country life is to become what it should be, and what I believe it ultimately will be—one of the most dignified, desirable, and sought-after ways of earning a living—the farmer must take advantage not only of the agricultural knowledge which is at his disposal, but of the methods which have raised and continued to raise the standards of living and of intelligence in other callings.

Those engaged in all other industrial and commercial callings have found it necessary, under modern economic conditions, to organize themselves for mutual advantage and for the protection of their own particular interests in relation to other interests. The farmers of every progressive European country have realized this essential fact and have found in the co-operative system exactly the form of business combination they need.

Now, whatever the state may do toward improving the practice of agriculture, it is not within the sphere of any government to reorganize the farmers' business or reconstruct the social life of farming communities. It is, however, quite within its power to use its influence and the machinery of publicity which it can control for calling public attention to the needs of the facts. For example, it is the obvious duty of the government to call the attention of farmers to the growing monopolization of water power. The farmers, above all, should have that power, on reasonable terms, for cheap transportation, for lighting their homes, and for innumerable uses in the daily tasks of the farm.

It would be idle to assert that life on the farm occupies as good a position in dignity, desirability, and business results as the farmers might easily give it if they chose. One of the chief difficulties is the failure of country life, as it exists at present, to satisfy the higher social and intellectual aspirations of country people. Whether the constant draining away of so much of the best elements in the rural population into the towns is due chiefly to this cause or to the superior business opportunities of city life may be open to question. But no one at all familiar with farm life throughout the United States can fail to recognize the necessity for building up the life of the farm upon its social as well as upon its productive side.

Necessity for Co-operation.

It is true that country life has improved greatly in attractiveness, health and comfort, and that the farmer's earnings are higher than they were. But city life is advancing even more rapidly, because of the greater attention which is being given by the citizens of the towns to their own betterment. For just this reason the introduction of effective agricultural co-operation throughout the United States is of the first importance. Where farmers are organized co-operatively they not only avail themselves much more readily of business opportunities and improved methods, but it is found that the organizations which bring them together in the work of their lives are used also for social and intellectual advancement.

The co-operative plan is the best plan of organization wherever men have the right spirit to carry it out. Under this plan any business undertaking is managed by a committee; every man has one vote, and only one vote; and every one gets profits according to what he sells or buys or supplies. It develops individual responsibility and has a moral as well as a financial value over any other plan.

I desire only to take counsel with the farmers as fellow-citizens. It is not the problem of the farmers alone that I am discussing with them, but a problem which affects every city as well as every farm in the country. It is a problem which the working farmers will have to solve for themselves; but it is a problem which also affects in only less degree all the rest of us, and therefore if we can render any help toward its solution, it is not only our duty but our interest to do so.

The foregoing will, I hope, make it clear why I appointed a commission to consider problems of farm life which have hitherto had far too little attention, and the neglect of which has not only held back life in the country, but also lowered the efficiency of the whole nation. The welfare of the farmer is of vital consequence to the welfare of the whole community. The strengthening of country life, therefore, is the strengthening of the whole nation.

Work to Help the Farmers.

The commission has tried to help the farmers to see clearly their own problem and to see it as a whole; to distinguish clearly between what the government can do and what the farmers must do for themselves; and it wishes to bring not only the farmers, but the nation as a whole, to realize that the growing of crops, though an essential part, is only a part of country life. Crop growing is the essential foundation; but it is no less essential that the farmer shall get an adequate return for what he grows; and it is no less essential—indeed, it is literally vital—that he and his wife and his children shall lead the right kind of life.

For this reason, it is of the first importance that the United States department of agriculture, through which as prime agent the ideas the commission stands for must reach the people, should become without delay in fact a department of country life, fitted to deal not only with crops, but also with all the largor aspects of life in the open country.

From all that has been done and learned three great general and immediate needs of country life stand out:

First, effective co-operation among farmers, to put them on a level with the organized interests with which they do business.

Second, a new kind of schools in the country, which shall teach the children as much outdoors as indoors and perhaps more, so that they will prepare for country life, and not as at present, mainly for life in town.

Third, better means of communication, including good roads and a parcels post, which the country people are everywhere, and rightly, unanimous in demanding.

To these may well be added better sanitation; for easily preventable diseases hold several million country people in the slavery of continuous ill health.

Duty of the Government.

The commission points out, and I concur in the conclusion, that the most important help that the government, whether national or state, can give is to show the people how to go about these tasks of organization, education and communication with the best and quickest results. This can be done by the collection and spread of information. One community can thus be informed of what other communities have done, and one country of what other countries have done. Such help by the people's government would lead to a comprehensive plan of organization, education and communication, and make the farming country better to live in, for intellectual and social reasons as well as for purely agricultural reasons.

The government through the department of agriculture does not cultivate any man's farm for him. But it does put at his service useful knowledge that he would not otherwise get. In the same way the national and state governments might put into the people's hands the new and right knowledge of school work. The task of maintaining and developing the schools would remain, as now, with the people themselves.

The only recommendation I submit is that an appropriation of $25,000 be provided, to enable the commission to digest the material it has collected, and to collect and to digest much more that is within its reach, and thus complete its work. This would enable the commission to gather in the harvest of suggestion which is resulting from the discussion it has stirred up. The commissioners have served without compensation, and I do not recommend any appropriation for their services, but only for the expenses that will be required to finish the task they have begun.

To Develop Country Community.

To improve our system of agriculture seems to me the most urgent of the tasks which lie before us. But it cannot, in my judgment, be effected by measures which touch only the material and technical side of the subject; the whole business and life of the farmer must also be taken into account. Such considerations led me to appoint the commission on country life. Our object should be to help develop in the country community the great ideals of the community life as well as of personal character. One of the most important adjuncts to this end must be the country church, and I invite your attention to what the commission says of the country church and of the need of an extension of such work as that of the Young Men's Christian association in country communities. Let me lay special emphasis upon what the commission says at the very end of its report on personal ideals and local leadership. Everything resolves itself in the end into the question of personality. Neither society nor government can do much for country life unless there is voluntary response in the personal ideals of the men and women who live in the country. In the development of character, the home should be more important than the school, or than society at large. When once the basic material needs have been met, high ideals may be quite independent of income; but they cannot be realized without sufficient income to provide adequate foundation; and where the community at large is not financially prosperous it is impossible to develop a high average personal and community ideal. In short, the fundamental facts of human nature apply to men and women who live in the country just as they apply to men and women who live in the towns. Given a sufficient foundation of material well being, the influence of the farmers and farmers' wives on their children becomes the factor of first importance in determining the attitude of the next generation toward farm life. The farmer should realize that the person who most needs consideration on the farm is his wife. I do not in the least mean that she should purchase ease at the expense of duty. Neither man nor woman is really happy or really useful save on condition of doing his or her duty. If the woman shirks her duty as housewife, as home keeper, as the mother whose prime function is to bear and rear a sufficient number of healthy children, then she is not entitled to our regard. But if she does her duty she is more entitled to our regard even than the man who does his duty; and the man should show special consideration for her needs.

Welfare of Nation at Stake.

I warn my countrymen that the great recent progress made in city life is not a full measure of our civilization; for our civilization rests on the wholesomeness, the attractiveness, and the completeness, as well as the prosperity, of life in the country. The men and women on the farms stand for what is fundamentally best and most needed in our American life. Upon the development of country life rests ultimately our ability, by methods of farming requiring the highest intelligence, to continue to feed and clothe the hungry nations; to supply the city with fresh blood, clean bodies, and clear brains that can endure the terrific strain of modern life; we need the development of men in the open country, who will be in the future, as in the past, the stay and strength of the nation in time of war, and its guiding and controlling spirit in time of peace.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Poor Return for Hospitality.

Two women had descended the steps of a house whose owner was giving an afternoon tea. Vehicles spun up to the curb or away from it, and through the ever opening door passersby could get a glimpse of rose-shaded lights and hear the tinkle of music. But the two women had walked, and at almost their first step away from the house of festivity the one with the extra thin voice that foreigners like to judge us all by said:

"Did you notice that lamp shade? Did you notice it? Where on earth do you suppose she raked up a thing like that? I never saw such a fool shade in all the days of my life."

"I was too taken up with the waist she had on to have eyes for anything else. Of all the silly duds I ever saw, that waist was the limit. You could see it was made over and botched at that, and as for the skirt—"

And by that time the pair, who had accepted the hospitality of a woman unwise enough to admit them to her home, had passed beyond the hearing of the person behind.

Chinamen Stick to Quinine.

Most Chinese are slow about forswearing Oriental drugs and quackery. Many of them live here for years before they can be tempted to sample Occidental medicines, and some of them live and die without making the experiment. In fact, when a Chinese turns cosmopolitan taking American medicine is his final accomplishment. But when he does get the medicine habit quinine is his long suit. Whether or not it is good for what ails him, every Chinese who has learned to patronize American drug stores feeds his system with quinine pills.—New York Pharmaceutical Era.

REPORT TELLS OF NEEDS OF FARMER

SITUATION AS SEEN BY COMMISSION ON COUNTRY LIFE.

DEFICIENCIES POINTED OUT

Agriculture at Present Not Commercially as Profitable as It Is Entitled to Be—Highly Organized Rural Society Recommended as Desirable Step—Possible for Congress to Remove Many of the Handicaps.

Washington.—The report of the commission on country life, made to the president, was read in both houses of congress. Substantially the report was as follows:

To the President: The commission on country life herewith presents its report. The commission finds that agriculture in the United States, taken together, is prosperous commercially, when measured by the conditions that have obtained in previous years, although there are some regions in which this is only partially true. The country people are producing vast quantities of supplies for food, shelter, clothing, and for use in the arts. The country homes are improving in comfort, attractiveness and healthfulness. Not only in the material wealth that they produce, but in the supply of independent and strong citizenship, the agricultural people constitute the very foundation of our national efficiency. As agriculture is the immediate basis of country life, so it follows that the general affairs of the open country, speaking broadly, are in a condition of improvement.

Many institutions, organizations and movements are actively contributing to the increasing welfare of the open country. The most important of these are the United States department of agriculture, the colleges of agriculture and the experiment stations in the states, and the national farmers' organizations. These institutions and organizations are now properly assuming leadership in country life affairs, and consequently in many of the public questions of national bearing. With these agencies must be mentioned state departments of agriculture, agricultural societies, and organizations of very many kinds, teachers in schools, workers in church and other religious associations, traveling libraries, and many other groups, all working with commendable zeal to further the welfare of the people of the open country.

Most Prominent Deficiencies.

Yet it is true, notwithstanding all this progress as measured by historical standards, that agriculture is not commercially as profitable as it is entitled to be for the labor and energy that the farmer expends and the risks that he assumes, and that the social conditions in the open country are far short of their possibilities. We must measure our agricultural efficiency by the possibilities rather than by comparison with previous conditions. The farmer is almost necessarily handicapped in the development of his business, because his capital is small and the volume of his transactions limited; and he usually stands practically alone against organized interests. In the general readjustment of modern life due to the great changes in manufactures and commerce, inequalities and discriminations have arisen, and naturally the separate man suffers most. The unattached man has problems that government should understand.

The reasons for the lack of a highly organizer rural society are very many, as the full report explains. The leading specific causes are:

A lack of knowledge on the part of farmers of the exact agricultural conditions and possibilities of their regions;

Lack of good training for country life in the schools;

The disadvantage or handicap of the farmer as against the established business systems and interests, preventing him from securing adequate returns for his products, depriving him of the benefits that would result from unmonopolized rivers and the conservation of forests, and depriving the community, in many cases, of the good that would come from the use of great tracts of agricultural land that are now held for speculative purposes;

Lack of good highway facilities;

The widespread continuing depletion of soils, with the injurious effect on rural life;

A general need of new and active leadership.

Other causes contributing to the general result are: Lack of any adequate system of agricultural credit, whereby the farmer may readily secure loans on fair terms; the shortage of labor, a condition that is often complicated by intemperance among workmen; lack of institutions and incentives that tie the laboring man to the soil; the burdens and the narrow life of farm women; lack of adequate supervision of public health.

Nature of the Remedies.

Some of the remedies lie with the national government, some of them with the states and communities in their corporate capacities, some with voluntary organizations, and some with individuals acting alone. From the great number of suggestions that have been made, covering every phase of country life, the commission now enumerates those that seem to be most fundamental or most needed at the present time.

Congress can remove some of the handicaps of the farmer, and it can also set some kinds of work in motion, such as:

The encouragement of a system of thorough-going surveys of all agricultural regions in order to take stock and to develop a scientifically and economically sound country life;

The establishing of a nationalized system of extension work in rural communities through all the land-grant colleges with the people at their homes and on their farms;

A thorough-going investigation by experts of the middleman system of handling farm products, coupled with a general inquiry into the farmer's disadvantages in respect to taxation, transportation rates, co-operative organizations and credit, and the general business system;

An inquiry into the control and use of the streams of the United States with the object of protecting the people in their ownership and of saving to agricultural uses such benefits as should be reserved for these purposes;

The establishing of a highway engineering service, or equivalent organization, to be at the call of the states in working out effective and economical highway systems;

The establishing of a system of parcels posts and postal savings banks;

And providing some means or agency for the guidance of public opinion toward the development of a real rural society that shall rest directly on the land.

Other remedies recommended for consideration by congress are:

The enlargement of the United States bureau of education, to enable it to stimulate and co-ordinate the educational work of the nation;

Careful attention to the farmers' interests in legislation on the tariff, on regulation of railroads, control or regulation of corporations and of speculation, legislation in respect to rivers, forests, and the utilization of swamp lands;

Increasing the powers of the federal government in respect to the supervision and control of the public health;

Providing such regulations as will enable the states that do not permit the sale of liquors to protect themselves from traffic from adjoining states.

In setting all these forces in motion, the co-operation of the states will be necessary; and in many cases definite state laws may greatly aid the work.

Remedies of a more general nature are: A broad campaign of publicity, that must be undertaken until all the people are informed on the whole subject of rural life, and until there is an awakened appreciation of the necessity of giving this phase of our national development as much attention as has been given to other phases or interests; a quickened sense of responsibility, in all the country people, to the community and the state in the conserving of soil fertility, and in the necessity for diversifying farming in order to conserve this fertility and to develop a better rural society, and also in the better safe-guarding of the strength and happiness of the farm women; a more widespread conviction of the necessity of organization, not only for economic but for social purposes, this organization to be more or less co-operative, so that all the people may share equally in the benefits and have voice in the essential affairs of the community; a realization on the part of the farmer that he has a distinct natural responsibility toward the laborer in providing him with good living facilities, and in helping him in every way to be a man among men; and a realization on the part of all the people of the obligation to protect and develop the natural scenery and attractiveness of the open country.

Certain remedies lie with voluntary organizations and institutions. All organized forces, both in town and country, should understand that there are country phases as well as city phases of our civilization, and that one phase needs help as much as the other. All these agencies should recognize their responsibility to society. Many existing organizations and institutions might become practically co-operative or mutual in spirit, as, for example, all agricultural societies, libraries, Young Men's Christian associations, and churches. All the organizations standing for rural progress should be federated, in state and nation.

Underlying Problem of Country Life.

The commission has pointed out a number of remedies that are extremely important; but running through all of these remedies are several great forces, or principles, which must be utilized in the endeavor to solve the problems of country life. All the people should recognize what these fundamental forces and agencies are.

Knowledge.—To improve any situation, the underlying facts must be understood. The farmer must have exact knowledge of his business and of the particular conditions under which he works. The United States department of agriculture and the experiment stations and colleges are rapidly acquiring and distributing this knowledge; but the farmer may not be able to apply it to the best advantage because of lack of knowledge of his own soils, climate, animal and plant diseases, markets, and other local facts. The farmer is entitled to know what are the advantages and disadvantages of his conditions and environment. A thorough-going system of surveys in detail of the exact conditions underlying farming in every locality is now an indispensable need to complete and apply the work of the great agricultural institutions. As an occupation, agriculture is a means of developing our internal resources; we cannot develop these resources until we know exactly what they are.

Education.—There must be a system of education which will be thoroughly adapted to the real needs of the farming people. The country schools are to be so redirected that they shall educate their pupils in terms of the daily life. Opportunities for training toward the agricultural callings are to be multiplied and made broadly effective. Every person on the land, old or young, in school or out of school, educated or illiterate, must have a chance to receive the information necessary for a successful business, and for a healthful, comfortable, resourceful life, both in home and neighborhood. This means redoubled efforts for better country schools, and a vastly increased interest in the welfare of country boys and girls on the part of those who pay the school taxes. Education by means of agriculture is to be a part of our regular public school work. Special agricultural schools are to be organized. There is to be a well-developed plan of extension teaching conducted by the agricultural colleges, by means of the printed page, face-to-face talks, and demonstration or object lesson, designed to reach every farmer and his family, at or near their homes, with knowledge and stimulus in every department of country life.

Organization.—There must be a vast enlargement of voluntary organized effort among farmers themselves. It is indispensable that farmers shall work together for their common interests and for the national welfare. If they do not do this, no governmental activity, no legislation, not even better schools, will greatly avail. The farmers are nevertheless relatively unorganized. We have only begun to develop business co-operation in America. Farmers do not influence legislation as they should. They need a more fully organized social and recreative life.

Spiritual Forces.—The forces and institutions that make for morality and spiritual ideals among rural people must be energized. We miss the heart of the problem if we neglect to foster personal character and neighborhood righteousness. The best way to preserve ideals for private conduct and public life is to build up the institutions of religion. The church has great power of leadership. The whole people should understand that it is vitally important to stand behind the rural church and to help it to become a great power in developing concrete country life ideals. It is especially important that the country church recognize that it has a social responsibility to the entire community as well as a religious responsibility to its own group of people.

Recommendations of the Commission.

The commission recommends all the correctives that have been mentioned under the head of "The nature of the remedies." It does not wish to discriminate between important measures of relief for existing conditions. It has purposely avoided indorsing any particular bill now before congress, no matter what its value or object.

There are, however, in the opinion of the commission, two or three great movements of the utmost consequence that should be set under way at the earliest possible time, because they are fundamental to the whole problem of ultimate permanent reconstruction; these call for special explanation.

Taking Stock of Country Life.—There should be organized, as explained in the main report, under government leadership, a comprehensive plan for an exhaustive study or survey of all the conditions that surround the business of farming and the people who live in the country, in order to take stock of our resources and to supply the farmer with local knowledge. Federal and state governments, agricultural colleges, and other educational agencies, organizations of various types, and individual students of the problem, should be brought into co-operation for this great work of investigating with minute care all agricultural and country life conditions.

Nationalized Extension Work.—Each state college of agriculture should be empowered to organize as soon as practicable a complete department of college extension, so managed as to reach every person on the land in its state, with both information and inspiration. The work should include such forms of extension teaching as lectures, bulletins, reading courses, correspondence courses, demonstration, and other means of reaching the people at home and on their farms. It should be designed to forward not only the business of agriculture, but sanitation, education, home making, and all interests of country life.

Call for Leadership.

We must picture to ourselves a new rural social structure, developed from the strong resident forces of the open country; and then we must set at work all the agencies that will tend to bring this about. The entire people need to be roused to this avenue of usefulness. A new race of teachers is to appear in the country. A new rural clergy is to be trained. These leaders will see the great underlying problem of country life, and together they will work, each in his own field, for the one goal of a new and permanent rural civilization. On the development of this distinctively rural civilization rests ultimately our ability, by methods of farming requiring the highest intelligence, to continue to feed and clothe the hungry nations; to supply the city and metropolis with fresh blood, clean bodies, and clear brains that can endure the strain of modern urban life; and to preserve a race of men in the open country that, in the future as in the past, will be the stay and strength of the nation in the time of war, and its guiding and controlling spirit in time of peace.

It is to be hoped that many young men and women, fresh from our schools and institutions of learning, and quick with ambition and trained intelligence, will feel a new and strong call to service.

WHAT IF THE EARTH SHOULD BLOW UP

The Cause of Earthquake and Tidal Waves.

If scientists could only sink a test tube down into the center of the earth they might be able to ascertain more accurately just what is going on in the far interior and might more nearly tell what is going to happen on the earth's crust. The appalling disaster in Italy has forced home again the fact that the earth is really a high-pressure boiler, with intermittent eruptions and earthquakes which carry destruction to man and the works of man. With volcanic eruptions, earthquakes and tidal waves occurring in some places, what is to prevent similar unexpected outbreaks in others? Nothing at all, under similar geographical conditions.

These and many other questions and answers have probably arisen in the mind of every speculative man and woman since the dawn of the new year, when the full extent and horror of the Italian disaster began to be fully realized. And it is scarcely to be expected that very much consolation will be derived therefrom, or even from the statements of some scientists regarding this earth's internal troubles, their alarming causes and probable disastrous results.

It is not very comforting for instance, to be solemnly informed that we are living today on the outer shell of a high pressure boiler, which leaks badly in certain weak spots and "blows out" with alarming frequency along a certain weak plate which is geographically known as the "earthquake belt."

If you take a map of the world and draw a broad line straight across the Pacific ocean, from the Philippines islands to Panama, thence across the Atlantic ocean through the the British West Indies to Spain and Italy, thence continuing across Europe and Asia to Japan, and on to the starting point in the Philippines, you will see exactly where the earthquake belt lies.

There are other minor belts, one of which passes southward along the coast of California and Mexico and the west coast of South America. There are evidences observable today in practically all parts of the world of other earthquake belts in which tremendous geological changes and upheavels were wrought in prehistoric times.

Even New York city is in an earthquake belt. At some time, probably thousands and thousands of years ago, a mighty earthquake split asunder the rock that united what is now the Island of Manhattan to the Palisades of the New Jersey coast. That earthquake formed the Hudson river.

Earthquake belts are admittedly weak spots in the outer crust of the earth—the high pressure boiler on which we live—and there is no evidence that any of them were ever permanently repaired.

Prof. Edward Suess, the eminent Vienna geologist, predicted a few days ago that eruptions would follow the earthquake and tidal wave in southern Italy. He attributed the earthquake to the sinking of the earth's crust, otherwise a buckling of the boiler plates, in the zone of which the Lipari islands are the center. He declared that as the process of sinking went on the Calabrian and Sicilian highlands on either side of the Straits of Messina would be submerged, only the highest peaks remaining above the sea. The strait, he said, would thereby be greatly widened.

Prof. Suess is of the opinion that the earth's crust is gradually shrinking everywhere. There is consolation to be found, however, in his further remark that the life of the human species will be too short to make this phenomenon important to mankind.

The average thickness of the earth's crust, the boiler plates, is generally assumed to be 50 miles and its average density to be about five times that of water. Scientists have estimated that the downward pressure at a depth of 50 miles below the surface of the earth is somewhat in excess of half a million pounds to the square inch. It is a safe conclusion that within a large portion of the earth,s crust there exist pent-up gases, particularly steam, under a pressure equal to that of the most powerful high explosives. High explosives probably exert pressures ranging from 200,000 to 350,000 pounds to the square inch.

When a high explosive is detonated the amount of pressure dedends upon the volume of gases liberated and the temperature of the gases. Nitro-glycerine, exploded in a space where it could not expand, would exert a pressure of probably from 300,000 to 350,000 pounds to the square inch. The pressure would certainly be less than half a million pounds to the square inch, although the temperature of the gases would equal the boiling point of steel. Consequently, with a 500,000 pound force holding in check a 350,000 pound force which is continuously exerting itself in an effort to burst the earth's crust asunder, it is reasonably safe to assume that the stronger force will continue to prevail, for some time to come at least, and that there is not the slightest danger of the earth blowing to pieces.

Unfortunately, as the appalling record of earthquakes shows, there are many very weak spots in the earth's crust. Deep down under the crust, where water has entered through faults, to be entrapped and highly heated. with no room for expansion, it dissolves the rock, and as under the enormous pressure it forces its way through narrow crevices to new positions, it cuts new channels in the granite floors, just as in glacial time subglacial streams cut passages through the ice.

Consequently, when the eruption of a volcano takes place, relieving the pressure in the deep passages under it, there is a rush toward the outlet of the streams of superheated water made syrupy with stone in solution. As these streams of silica-charged water find vent at the volcano the expansion of the pent-up stream takes place with explosive violence, forming volcanic dust and pumice stone, which are belched forth in stupendous quantities. Then portions of the earth's crust, which have been resting upon a support of steam under dynamite pressures, naturally sag and shift when those pressures are removed or materially lessened.

The vast amount of solid matter ejected at times from volcanoes is difficult of comprehension. The great volcano Krakatoa had been extinct for ages when, in 1883, its top blew off with a shock felt clear through the earth and with a blast that sent a wave of air around the earth three times, while the fine volcanic dust did not entirely settle out of the atmosphere for more than two years, as was indicated by the unusually brilliant display of red sunsets. It is estimated that more mud was ejected from the mountain on that occasion than the Mississippi river discharges in 250 years. This was the greatest volcanic eruption in historic times. The distance is not too great nor the time too remote for the eruption of Mont Pelee to have caused the earthquakes of San Francisco, Valparaiso and Kingston, while possibly Vesuvius may have played a material part.

MARYLAND VS. HER SISTER STATE, WEST VIRGINIA

Suit to Determine Boundary Line To Be Heard Soon.

Attorney General Straus has taken up the suit of Maryland against West Virginia to establish jurisdiction over 46 square miles of land about the headwaters of the Potomac river, in the far Western part of the Stote. This sbit was begun in 1891, when the late Senator Whyte was the Attorney General of Maryland. It was dragged along until the present time, but Mr. Straus expects to argue it before the Supreme Court of the United States either in the spring or fall, probably the latter, ot this year.

This boundary question has been a bone of contention for almost two centuries. Maryland and Virginia argued over the proposition many years. When West Virginia separated from the parent State the wrangle was transferred to it. There are 29,440 acres in 46 square miles. On such an area are many farms, opposite Garrett county, Maryland, is Preston county, West Virginia. Not a few farmers have adopted the policy of stoutly contending that they are residents of West Virginia when approached by the tax collector of Maryland. They are equally sure of their citizenship in Maryland when they are approached by the tax collector of West Virginia. Crimes have been committed in this territory in which the jurisdiction of the county courts, whether in Maryland or West Virginia, were successfully questioned. Altogether no little confusion has resulted from the existence of a sort of no man's land.

Differences of opinion seem to have arisen because of the inability to definitely determine the source of the Potomac. This river like most others, has quite a modest beginning, and whether it should be considered as starting from the Potomac spring, lying to the west, or Michler spring, lying to the east, has occasioned the whole dispute.

When King Charles granted Lord Baltimore a charter to a tract of land in the New World he laid down as its bounds a meridian to the "first fountain of the river Pottowmack, thence verging toward the south unto the further bank of the said river and following the same on the west and south to a certain place called Cinquak."

Maryland claims that the Michler spring is not the proper starting point for a river like the "Pottowmack," for not infrequently it drys up completely, where as the Potomac spring to the west pours forth a never-ceasing stream of pure water.

Early in the Nineteenth Century a certain Fairfax planted a stone above the Michler spring, and henceforth Virginia was disposed to regard the Fairfax stone as the limits of Maryland's territory to the west. It is contended, however, that Fairfax had no authority from the people of Maryland to plant a stone and that this particular stone was never accepted by the State as marking the limits and bounds of any of its territory. West Virginia inherited the stone and contention, and it has stuck to each with great constancy,

The late Senator Whyte pushed the case along. Maryland had engineers in the field, who made reports substantiating the State's side of the case, and historical associations, including the Maryland Historical Society, produced documents to show that Maryland had a charter right to all the lands she was claiming. Witnesses were produced, old records unearthed and cases cited in which justice went astray. All the facts are embraced in 1990 pages, filling two big volumes,

When John P. Poe was Attorney General he struggled with the case, and William Shepherd Bryan, Jr., did considerable work on it. Some of the other Attorneys General were not quite so energetic, but Mr. Straus is going to put it up to the learned judges of the Supreme Court.

In the meantime certain lands about the headwaters of the Potomac are as wild as they were in the days when Columbus discovered the hemispheee, for it is set forth as part of the records in the case that bears prowl about and deer browse on the leaves of the laurel.

Land for Sale.

We have for sale the following valuable tracts of land :

One Military Lot of 50 acres, a small portion of which is under cultivation. All good land, and every acre tillable. Watered by several good springs and a never failing small run. Contains some good timber. One-half mile from R. R. siding, and one and one-half miles from Oakland.

Also part of two Military Lots containing about 50 acres. This property is directly East of Oakland, on the South side of the B. & O. R. R. siding on the North side of tracks. Contains valuable grazing land, a portion of which is in cultivation. Valuable R. R. frontage.

Also 10 acres suitable for building sites, just East of Oakland on the North side of the Oakland and Mt. Lake Park road.

SIX MONTHS IN THE CUT

Was The Sentence Imposed Upon William Warnick.

William Warnick, of near Bond, who was tried before the Court at the December Term on an indictment charging him with shooting Emma Warnick through the hand on June 20 last, and who jumped his bond immediately after the conclusion of the case, was surrendered to Sheriff Brown a few days ago by his bondsman and placed in jail. Warnick, since the close of court, has been at the home of his father, George Warnick, who was also his bondsman.

On Tuesday Judge Henderson, before whom Warnick was tried, came to Oakland and rendered a verdict finding him guilty and immediately sentenced him to serve a term of six months in the House of Correction, to which institution Sheriff Brown will convey the prisoner tomorrow morning.

BITTINGER.

C. E. Ellithorp received a car load of lime this week, which he will use on his farm the coming season.

Rev. Yugel and A. J. Oester made a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

Jacob Fazenbaker, a resident of this section, is reported to be in a serious condition, mentally, and his friends are arranging to have him removed to Cumberland for treatment. The unfortunate man's family is said to be suffering from want of provisions and we learn that some generous persons have donated sufficient for their present needs, for which those persons are to be heartily commended.

Christian J. Shrock was a visitor to this village Monday afternoon.

G. W. Emory, a member of the Second Regiment, U. S. Infantry, who is on a sixty-day furlough, is spending a few days with his brother, J. B. Emory, in this village.

Miss Nettie Brininger, who was spending a few weeks with her sister, Mrs. J. T. Lohr, at this place, returned to her home at Sunnyside on Friday of last week.

The ladies of the Lutheran church at this place will hold an ice cream social in the basement of the parsonage on next Saturday evening, at which time a musical program will be rendered in the parsonage, to both of which functions the public is cordially invited and will be heartily welcome.

Dudish.

H. R. DEWITT,
Late Treasurer of Garrett county.

Sent to Hospital.

McClelland Rodeheaver, of near Hutton, who has been ill several months with tuberculosis of the bone of his right elbow, was sent to the Maryland General Hospital in Baltimore for treatment Tuesday morning. The probabilities are that his arm will have to be amputated as the disease has made deep inroads.

SEED CORN FOR SALE—Pure bred Yellow Dent selected seed corn. First prize winner at Maryland State Corn Show at Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore, Md., Dec. 3, 1908. Also pure bred Boone Co., white corn, the variety that produced the first prize winner in white corn. Early maturing. A. B. Twining, Forest Hill, Md. 46-8t.pd.

Inhabitants of the Museum.

Little Dorothy had been taken by a friend to visit the museum and was very much interested in the stuffed animals in the glass cages, and also in the statuary. On returning home she ran eagerly to her mother, saying: "Oh, mamma, we saw some real live, stuffed animals and some sample people."

Their Similarity.

"A rolling stone gathers no moss," remarked the proverb dispenser. "And, like the human high roller," rejoined the thoughtful thinker, "it also gravitates downhill."

Severe.

"Aw, I suppose you don't keep decent biscuits in this benighted village?" asked an English tourist contemptuously of the general shopkeeper. "Oh, yes, we do!" replied the man. "In a bag, or eat 'em here, sir?"

Positively "The Best Seller."

Probably the name of the late Noah Webster stands at the head of the list of those whose books have been "the best sellers." Seventy-five million spelling books and from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 dictionaries look like record figures.

Politeness Pays.

Nothing pays so well as politeness, except industry and honesty. And an industrious, honest man is handicapped if he is not polite. Don't leave a trail of grumbling and ill nature wherever you go.—Atchison Globe.

Georgia Editor's Mistake.

Olive Fremstad, who has just come from Europe, says the women are wearing monocles over there. It reminds us that the last time we used the word monocle the printer made it manacle, and we had to hide out for two days.—Atlanta Georgian.

Definition of a Giraffe.

The children had written compositions on the giraffe. They were reading them aloud to the class. At last the time came for little Willie Doran to read his. It was as follows: "The giraffe is a dumb animal and cannot express itself by any sound, because its neck is so long its voice gets tired on its way to its mouth."

More Beauty.

When a man tells a girl that mere beauty doesn't appeal to him he's trying in his kind, clumsy way to comfort her because she isn't pretty.

Marked Improvement.

"My washerwoman," Mrs. Lansing was saying, "used to lose ever so many of my sheets and pillow cases, but she doesn't now. I mark them all with intelligible ink."

VOLUME 32. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1909. NUMBER 51

THE ACCIDENT-GRANTSVILLE GEOLOGIC FOLIO.

Important New Publication by United States Geological Survey.

The latest addition to the geologic map of the country which is in preparation by the United States Geological Survey and is being issued in parts called folios, describes two adjoining areas situated for the most part in the northwest corner of Maryland. By the Survey these areas are called the Accident and Grantsville quadrangles. Each covers one-sixteenth of a square degree, or about 230 square miles. Nearly all the area of these quadrangles is in Garrett county, Md., but a strip about 2 miles wide, extending across the northern edge of both quadrangles, lies in Fayette and Somerset counties, Pa., and another strip two-thirds of a mile wide on the western edge of the Accident quadrangle is in dispute between Garrett county, Md., and Preston county, W. Va. The largest towns of the Accident quadrangle are Friendsville and Accident, Md.; those of the Grantsville quadrangle are Salisbury, Pa., and Grantsville and Barton, Md.

These quadrangles were surveyed in co-operation with the Maryland Geological Survey, the field work having been completed by G. C. Martin, now of the Federal Survey, while he was still a member of the State organization, and the folio was prepared under the supervision of William Bullock Clark, the co-operating geologist. Full discussions of the areas are published also in reports issued by the Maryland Geological Survey, particularly in those on Garrett county, by Mr. Martin.

The areas contain important mineral resources, as yet in a very early stage of development. Coal is now, and will probably long continue to be the most important product; but deposits of fire clay have been found which are extremely promising, and it is not unlikely that this and other important clay and cement industries will be established in the future. The supply of limestone in this region is inexhaustible, but it has been drawn upon only for local use. Iron-ore deposits similar to those which in neighboring regions have been of great value in the past are also found here, yet they hold only remote possibilities for future development. Some of the sandstones and limestones are suitable for local use as building stone and road material.

Portions of the areas poorer in mineral deposits contains rocks from which a rich soil has been formed. These regions will be much benefited through the development of the mining areas, by the market which will thus be provided for agricultural products, and the mining regions will in turn receive much benefit from being surrounded by rich and prosperous farming regions.

The folio text describes in detail the areal distribution, sequence, and structure of the rocks and the valuable minerals contained in the formations, and the same details are shown by the geologic maps and sections. A topograpic map of each quadrangle exhibits faithfully the surface features—the hills, streams, roads, and even the location of isolated houses.

The Accident-Grantsville folio is one of several describing the quadrangles that lies along the northern border of Maryland between the Allegheny plateau and the sea, to be published in co-operation with the Maryland Geological Survey. These folios will form an educational series to illustrate the geology of the middle Atlantic slope.

In accordance with the provisions of law, the Survey maps and folios are sold, but the prices fixed (for this folio 25 cents) cover merely the cost of paper and printing. Prepayment is obligatory, and applications should be addressed to the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

HOYES.

We are experiencing quite changeable weather at this time, February seemingly advancing into March, as we first have snow, sunshine then showers.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Loudermilk were called to Selbysport Tuesday on account of the sudden death of Mrs. Frank Lowdermilk and babe. The interment of mother and child was made Wednesday at Addison.

Mr. George E. Bishoff made a business trip to Oakland last week.

Misses Della Savage and Auburn Smith went to Oakland last Saturday to attend the funeral of their neice and cousin Vera Ferguson which took place Sunday afternoon.

We are sorry to note the illness of James Wilburn, who after having quinsy is suffering with a severe attack of rheumatism.

Willie Mattingly attended the sale of Gustave Goehringer at Accident Tuesday.

The funeral of William A. Dewitt, which occurred at this place Friday last, was largely attended by relatives and friends, showing the high esteem in which he was held. The pallbearers were his young friends and associates from Cranesville, W. Va.

J. A. DeWitt, of Connellsville, Pa., spant several days the past week with his uncle M. Mattingly and attended the funeral of his brother.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Haigh, of Cranesville, W. Va., spent last Friday night with relatives in Hoyes returning to their home Saturday morning.

President-elect Taf: Passed Through Oakland.

Monday night on train No. 4 President-elect and Mrs. William H. Taft passed through Oakland en route to Washington, D. C. The couple occupied a state room in one of the sleeping cars.

ARGUMENT AGAINST BALTIMORE FOR THE COUNTIES

Able Treatise Against Increased Legislative Representation for Baltimore.

The Baltimore Sun, in a series of editerial articles recently concluded, has presented to its readers the claims of Baltimore City for increased representation for Baltimore in the legislative chambers, basing the claims largely on the fact that population should count mainly in representation combined with other equally important claims (to the Sun) which it is not the intention to refer to here. The following able, scholarly and comprehensive letter of Mr. Albert A. Doub, attorney-at-law of this city, taking the part of the counties of the state in the matter, places the issue boldly and clearly before the people. Mr. Doub's claim that "on the basis of population Allegany county ought to have two or three senators, and ten or a dozen delegates," is clearly defined if the the arguments of the Baltimore Sun will hold water. The letter:

Editor of Daily News—The proposition to increase the representation of the city of Baltimore in the General Assembly of Maryland, seems to have met with the approval of a large element of both parties in the city of Baltimore, but this suggestion does not justifiy itself to the citizens of counties who are not familiar with the exigencies of party politics or the demands of private interests. It is not intended to suggest that an African may be concealed in this political lumber pile, but it is perhaps well to remember that the Ethiopian on close inspection has often been hidden in apparently innocent party planks from the same source.

The representation of Baltimore city was increased by constitutional amendment in 1900, so that it now has four senators out of twenty-seven, and 24 delegates out of a total of 101. The framers of the present constitution constructed wisely and realized that the members of the delegation from Baltimore, representating a solidarity of interersts, would generally stand together on legislation affecting the city or the counties and that those of the counties, not having a community of interests, would rarely be united, and therefore they provided that too large a representation should not be given to our metropolis. By the log-rolling process, with 24 delegates, one-fourth of the lower house, the city of Baltimore can easily control the House of Delegates now or generally secure a majority in favor of any legislation it favors.

In the Senate, with only 4 votes, it can not dominate legislation, but a slight increase of this number would enable the Baltimore delegation to control the Senate, by the process of trading votes and otherwise. It is not ten years since Baltimore received an increase in its delegation and the census returns for 1910 will not be available for some time. However there is no reason to suppose there has been in the last decade such an inordinate and disproportionate increase in the population of Baltimore as to cry aloud for another amendment of the constitution of this sort.

We all know the state has outgrown the Constitution and the counties want numerous changes, but the political parties both contend that the present generation, for some unknown reason, can not be trusted to frame a new one for itself, and Baltimore ought to be willing to wait for another generation to give it relief, as the counties have to do. Of course it would not be wise for the people to frame a new constitution for themselves, if thereby a political head might be sacrificed.

However, the slight growth of the population of Baltimore does not justify any change in the representation. Baltimore city has five times the population of Baltimore county, but four time the number senators and four times the number of delegates. Baltimore county has nine times the population of Calvert and in the same proportion, if population is the determining factor, it ought to have many more senators and fifteen or sixteen delegates, since Calvert now has one senator and two delegates. Like wise on the basis of population, Allegany ought to have two or three senators and ten or a dozen delegates, unless the representation of Calvert and Charles, with their small population, is to be reduced. Of course such an increase in the representation of the populous counties is impossible, and it is therefore absurd to contend that Baltimore city is entitled to have its representation increased with each recurring decade, by constitutional amendment, merely on account of increase of population, unless some of the counties with their growing numbers can have additional senators also, and the whole principle upon which the legislative department is based is to be changed by a new constitution. The checks and balances between the city and counties ought to be maintained as it is, or the balance of power will be permanently given over to the city of Baltimore.

Paris may be France, but the counties of this state are not yet willing to declare in their Constitution that Baltimore is Maryland, for if the representation of Baltimore is increased, the counties will be at the mercy of the city and will have to feed meekly from her hand. The counties thus far have always been fair to the city in meeting every proper demand, and certainly have given no cause for serious complaint.

There is as much reason for the states of New York and Pennsylvania demanding an increase of the number of senators in the Congress by reason of their great population, as compared with other states, as for the city of Baltimore to demand more state senators for a similar reason. It is very important that the counties of the state, irrespective of party, awaken to the danger threatened by this proposal, before, by submission to it, they have lost all substantial influence in the General Assembly of the state.

The editors of the Baltimore Sun, who are conducting the fight for the city of Baltimore, have restricted the discussion of this question in its columns to arguments in favor of the proposed change in the constitution, and it behooves the press of the counties to bring home to their people the danger that menaces the public welfare by this effort to make Baltimore supreme and, when another Freeman Rasin arises to pollute the politics of the city, to make him the arbiter of the destinies of the state as well.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

"The Invincibles," the young men's bible class of the M. E. S. S., held the regular monthly business meeting and social at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Hayden, Friday evening last. In the absence of the president Rev. J. W. Bolton occupied the chair. Before taking up the business of the evening a song was rendered by the class, which was followed by a Scripture reading and prayer by Rev. C. W. Hudson of the Baptist church. The roll was then called, showing thirty-one members present. Five new members were enrolled among the number being Dr. W. W. Davis and Rev. C. W. Hudson, making a total membership of fifty-three. The business of the evening being disposed of the meeting closed with a prayer by Dr. Davis, and the social program was rendered consisting of piano solos and songs by Miss Mazie Prevost and Miss Edna Chance, recitations by Miss June Dunnington, and songs by the class quartette. The music by Miss Prevost and the recitations by Miss Dunnington were much enjoyed. During the evening short talks were given by Dr. Davis and Revs. Hudson and Bolton. After the entertainment refreshments consisting of several varieties of cake and orange punch were served to the class and their guests, fifty-two in all, Misses Mazie Prevost, June Dunnington and Ruth Rudisill presiding at the punch bowl. The occasion was enjoyed by all present. The next meeting will be at the parsonage on the evening of the second Friday of March

Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of Mountain Lake Park, fears there will be no ice harvest on Mountain Lake this year. Dr. Davis has improved the ice harvesting facilities at the lake and could cut 100 tons an hour. He has arranged for work day and night in event there should be a freeze. He has harvested a small quantity of ice about five inches thick for local use, but has been unable to get ice of sufficient thickness to fill his big contracts, one being to furnish the Baltimore and Ohio railroad 10,000 tons. The ice harvest on Mountain Lake is quite an industry and the community will feel the loss should there be no freeze. Late last week week there was ice on the lake but the present thaw has rendered it unfit for harvesting.

Indications point to Mountain Lake Park having the best season in its history this year. It is thought from the interest being shown that it will open with more people at the resort than ever before. The schedule at the park includes the following: Young Women's Christian Association under the auspices of the international committee of the Young Woman's Christian Association, June 25—July 5; Maryland State Teachers' Association, June 29—July 2; Home Mission Church Extension Conference, July 15—19; Woman's Foreign Missionary Society Anniversary, July 23—26; Christian Workers' Conference, July 25—August 1; Mountain Chautauqua, month of August.

The Christian Workers' Conference will be on the same general plan as that at Northfield, Mass., founded by Dwight L. Moody. It will be in charge of Dr. Henry Ostrom. About 400 delegates will attend the meeting of ths Young Women's Christian Association. This organization holds a series of nine conferences in the summer in various sections of the country and the one at Mountain Lake Park is known as the East Central Conference College Section. Last year 268 delegates attended the conference and among them were nine girls from Wellesley College, Mass. In all 70 schools were represented. College day of the conference was a notable occasion.

An effort is being made to establish a State Teachers' Training School for Maryland at Mountain Lake Park. The project has the encouragement of Governor Crothers and State Superintendent M. Bates Stephens. If the school is opened it would likely be right after the meeting of the State Teachers' Association and would last probably a month. The fine air at Mountain Lake Park which is 2500 feet above sea level is conducive to study. Last year at least 200 Maryland teachers went to training schools of other states. From Wicomico county alone, 21 teachers went to the training school at the University of Virginia.

Mr. W. E. Riggs, representing the F. W. Baumer Piano Co., of Wheeling, W. Va., was in the Park on "business" Tuesday and Wednesday.

Mr. C. F. Dawson is in Deer Park taking care of Dr. B. Frank Laughlin, who was brought from a sanitorium to the home of his parents a few days ago. We understand that Dr. Frank's condition has not improved

Special services will begin in the M. E. church Sunday.

There have been over twenty-five conversions during the meeting at Bond, which will likely be closed the last of this week.

Mrs Waldy of Piedmont, W. Va., was here several days this week visiting her daughter, Mrs. Lee N. Hayden.

Mr. H. P. Lewis, now conducting a restaurant in Piedmont, was here yesterday. He reports business fairly good in his line.

Mr. E. E. Friend spent Monday in Frostburg on business.

The announcement of the marriage of Mr. Albert Victor Cuppett and Miss Anna Louise Brown, which took place at Grafton, W. Va., yesterday, was received this morning. Bert's host of friends here wish the happy couple a long and prosperous life.

Must Go Together.

Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless.—Paley.

WILL HAVE THREE NORMALS

In Garrett County This Summer—At Grantsville, Friendsville and Oakland.

At a meeting of the School Board held on last Friday it was decided to have three normals for a term of eight weeks at the following places: Grantsville, Mr. C. C. Cathcart, principal; Friendsville, Mr. H. W. Browning, principal; Oakland, Mr. U. G. Palmer, principal, and Mr. A. W. DeWitt, assistant. The schools will open on April 12th and close on June 4th.

On June 7th the Summer Training School will open in Oakland for a term of three weeks with Messrs U. G. Palmer, A. W. DeWitt and T. S. Gibson as instructors. Some one yet to be selected will have charge of the primary work in this school.

The examination of teachers will take place during the last week of the training school term and the examination on Course of Study will occur on June 28th. All teachers who taught during the years 1908-9 and who attend the eight weeks' normal and the training school may have their certificates renewed without examination except on Course of Study. No tuition charge will be made for the training school course to the teachers who attend the eight weeks' normal, but those who do not attend the normal will be charged $1.50 for the training school course. Teachers coming from other counties will have to pay $3 for the course. At the close of the training school a certificate will be issued and signed by the faculty cetifying that the holder had attended the course. These certificates will be free to all teachers.

The old, tried end true teachers can merit a certificate good for five years with chance of renewal. We feel this is due some of our teachers and we feel also that we have some teachers who ought to be exempt from further examination during their future manifest skill and interest; but we feel also that we have many teachers in the county from whom we must expect considerable improvement in the future in both academic ability and professional skill before the standard of education can reach a plane approaching perfection. The degree of perfection, in the future of our schools must depend on the grade and perfection of our corps of teachers. To this end the board will work scrupulously and untiringly.

We suggest that during the eight weeks' normal close attention be give the study of text books used in the county, carefully noting and bringing all difficult points to the training school for solution.

For this year's work we predict great success and at the State Teachers' Association at Mountain Lake Park, to be held June 29—July 2, we anticipate a pleasure for our teachers such as they have never before had.

E. A. BROWNING, Sec'y.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

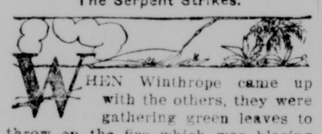
CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Serpent Strikes.



WHEN Winthrope came up with the others, they were gathering green leaves to throw on the fire which was blazing close beside the ant-hill.

"Get a move on you!" called Blake. "You're slow. Grab a bunch of leaves, and get into the smoke, if you don't want to be stung."

Winthrope neither gathered any leaves nor hurried himself, until he was visited by a highly irritated bee. Then he obeyed with alacrity. Blake was far too intent on other matters to heed the Englishman. Leaping in and out of the thick of the smoke, he pounded the ant-hill with his club, until he had broken a gaping hole into the cavity. The smoke, pouring into the hive, made short work of the bees that had not already been suffocated.

Although the antelope skin was drawn into the shape of a sack, both it and the pot were filled to overflowing with honey, and there were still more combs left than the three could eat.

Blake caught Winthrope smiling with satisfaction as he licked his fingers.

"What's the matter with my expedition now, old man?" he demanded.

"I—ah—must admit, Blake, we have had a most enjoyable change of food."

"If you are sure it will agree with you," remarked Miss Leslie.

"But I am sure of that, Miss Genevieve. I could digest anything to-day. I'm fairly ravenous."

"All the more reason to be careful," rejoined Blake. "I guess, though, what we've had'll do no harm. We'll let it settle a bit, here in the shade, and then hit the home trail."

"Could we not first go to the river, Mr. Blake? My hands are dreadfully sticky."

"Win will take you. It's only a little way to the bank here and there's not much underbrush."

"If you think it's quite safe—" remarked Winthrope.

"It's safe enough. Go on. You'll see the river in half a minute. Only thing, you'd better watch out for alligators."

"I believe that—er—properly speaking, these are crocodiles."

"You don't say! Heap of difference it will make if one gets you."

Miss Leslie caught Winthrope's eye. He turned on his heel, and led the way for her through the first thicket. Beyond this they came to a little glade which ran through to the river. When they reached the bank, they stepped cautiously down the muddy slope, and bathed their hands in the clear water. As Miss Leslie rose, Winthrope bent over and began to drink.

"Oh, Mr. Winthrope!" she exclaimed; "please don't! In your weak condition, I'm so afraid—"

"Do not alarm yourself. I am perfectly well, and I am quite as competent to judge what is good for me as your—ah—countryman."

"Mr. Winthrope, I am thinking only of your own good."

Winthrope took another deep draught, rinsed his fingers fastidiously, and arose.

"My dear Miss Genevieve," he observed, "a woman looks at these matters in such a different light from a man. But you should know that there are some things a gentleman cannot tolerate."

"Told You So! See Him Wriggle!"

"You were welcome to all the water in the flask. Surely with that you could have waited, if only to please me."

"Ah, if you put it that way, I must beg pardon. Anything to please you, I'm sure! Pray forgive me, and forget the incident. It is now past."

"I hope so!" she murmured; but her heart sank as she glanced at his sallow face, and she recalled his languid, feeble movements.

Piqued by her look, Winthrope started back through the glade. Miss Leslie was turning to follow, when she caught sight of a gorgeous crimson blossom under the nearest tree. It was the first flower she had seen since being shipwrecked. She uttered a little cry of delight, and ran to pluck the blossom.

Winthrope, glancing about at her exclamation, saw her stoop over the flower—and in the same instant he saw a huge, vivid coil, all black and green and yellow, flash up out of the bedded leaves and strike against the girl. She staggered back, screaming with horror, yet seemed unable to run.

Winthrope swung up his stick, and dashed across the glade toward her.

"What is it—a snake?" he cried.

The girl did not seem to hear him. She had ceased screaming, and stood rigid with fright, glaring down at the ground before her. In a moment Winthrope was near enough to make out the brilliant glistening body, now extended full length in the grass. It was nearly five feet long and thick as his thigh. Another step, and he saw the hideous triangular head, lifted a few inches on the thick neck. The cold eyes were fixed upon the girl in a malignant, deadly stare.

"Snake! snake!" he yelled, and thrust his cane at the reptile's tail.

Again came a flashing leap of the beautiful ornate coil, and the stick was struck from Winthrope's hand. He danced backward, wild with excitement.

"Snake!—Hi, Blake! monster!—Run, Miss Leslie! I'll hold him—I'll get another stick!"

He darted aside to catch up a branch, and then ran in and struck boldly at the adder, which reared hissing to meet him. But the blow fell short, and the rotten wood shattered on the ground. Again Winthrope ran aside for a stick. There was none near, and as he paused to glance about, Blake came sprinting down the glade.

"Where?" he shouted.

"There—Hi! look out! You'll be on him!"

Blake stopped short, barely beyond striking distance of the hissing reptile.

"Wow!" he yelled. "Puff adder! I'll fix him."

He leaped back, and thrust his bow at the snake. The challenge was met by a vicious lunge. Even where he stood Winthrope heard the thud of the reptile's head upon the ground.

"Now, once more, tootsie!" mocked Blake, swinging up his club.

Again the adder struck at the bow tip, more viciously than before. With the flash of the stroke, Blake's right foot thrust forward, and his club came down with all the drive of his sinewy arm behind it. The blow fell across the thickest part of the adder's outstretched body.

"Told you so! See him wiggle!" shouted Blake. "Broke his back, first lick— What's the matter, Miss Jenny? He can't do anything now."

Miss Leslie did not answer. She stood rigid, her face ashy-gray, her dilated eyes fixed upon the writhing, hissing adder.

"I think the snake struck her!" gasped Winthrope, suddenly overcome with horror.

"God!" cried Blake. He dropped his club, and rushed to the girl. In a moment he had knelt before and flung up her leopard-skin skirt. Her stockings ripped to shreds in his frantic grasp. There, a little below her right knee, was a tiny, red wound. Blake put his lips to it, and sucked with fierce energy.

Then the girl found her voice.

"Go away—go away! How dare you!" she cried, as her face flushed scarlet.

Blake turned, spat, and burst out with a loud demand of Winthrope: "Quick! the little knife—I'll have to slash it! Ten times worse than a rattlesnake— Lord! you're slow—I'll use mine!"

"Let go of me—let go! What do you mean, sir?" cried the girl, struggling to free herself.

"Hold still, you little fool!" he shouted. "It's death—sure death, if I don't get the poison from that bite!"

"I'm not bitten— Let go, I say! It struck in the fold of my skirt."

"For God's sake, Jenny, don't lie! It's certain death! I saw the mark—"

"That was a thorn. I drew it out an hour ago."

Blake looked up into her hazel eyes. They were blazing with indignant scorn. He freed her, and rose with clumsy slowness. Again he glanced at her quivering, scarlet face, only to look away with a sheepish expression.

"I guess you think I'm just a damned meddlesome idiot," he mumbled.

She did not answer. He stood for a little, rubbing a finger across his sun-blistered lips. Suddenly he stopped and looked at the finger. It was streaked with blood.

"Whew!" he exclaimed. "Didn't stop to think of that! It's just as well for me, Miss Jenny, that wasn't an adder bite. A little poison on my sore lip would have done for me. Ten to one, we'd both have turned up our toes at the same time. Of course, though, that'd be nothing to you."

Miss Leslie put her hands before her face and burst into hysterical weeping.

Blake looked around, far more alarmed than when facing the adder.

"Here, you blooming lud!" he shouted; "take the lady away, and be quick about it. She'll go dotty if she sees any more snake stunts. Clear out with her, while I smash the wriggler."

Winthrope, who had been staring fixedly at the beautiful coloring and loathsome form of the writhing adder, started at Blake's harsh command as though struck.

"I—er—to be sure," he stammered, and darting around to the hysterical girl, he took her arm and hurried her away up the glade.

They had gone several paces when Blake came running up behind them. Winthrope looked back with a glance of inquiry. Blake shook his head.

"Not yet," he said. "Give me your cigarette case. I've thought of something— Hold on; take out the cigarettes. Smoke 'em, if you like."

Case in hand, Blake returned to the wounded adder, and picked up his club. A second smashing blow would have ended the matter at once; but Blake did not strike. Instead, he feinted with his club until he managed to pin down the venomous head. The club lay across the monster's neck, and he held it fast with the pressure of his foot.

When, half an hour later, he wiped his knife on a wisp of grass and stood up, the cigarette case contained over a tablespoonful of a crystalline liquid. He peered in at it, his heavy jaw thrust out, his eyes glowing with savage elation.

"Talk about your meat trusts and Winchesters!" he exulted; "here's a whole carload of beef in this little box—enough dope to morgue a herd of steers. Good God, though, that was a close shave for her!"

His face sobered, and he stood for several moments staring thoughtfully into space. Then his gaze chanced to fall upon the great crimson blossom which had so nearly lured the girl to her death.

"Hello!" he exclaimed; "that's an amaryllis. Wonder if she wasn't coming to pick it—" He snapped shut the lid of the cigarette case, thrust it carefully into his shirt pocket, and stepped forward to pluck the flower. "Makes a fellow feel like a kid; but maybe it'll make her feel less sore at me."

He stood gazing at the flower for several moments, his eyes aglow with a soft blue light.

"Whew!" he sighed; "if only— But what's the use? She's 'way out of my class—a rough brute like me! All the same, it's up to me to take care of her. She can't keep me from being her friend—and she sure can't object to my picking flowers for her."

Amaryllis in hand, he gathered up his bow and club. Then he paused to study the skin of the decapitated adder. The inspection ended with a shake of his head.

"Better not, Thomas. It would make a dandy quiver; but then, it might get on her nerves."

When he came to the ant-hill, he found companions and honey alike gone. He went on to the cocoanuts. There he came upon Winthrope stretched flat beside the skin of honey. Miss Leslie was seated a little way beyond, nervously bending a palm-leaf into shape for a hat.

"I say, Blake," drawled Winthrope, "you've been a deuced long time in coming. It was no end of a task to lug the honey—"

Blake brushed past without replying, and went on until he stood before the girl. As she glanced up at him, he held out the crimson blossom.

"Thought you might like posies," he said, in a hesitating voice.

Instead of taking the flower, she drew back with a gesture of repulsion.

"Oh, take it away!" she exclaimed.

Blake flung the rejected gift on the ground, and crushed it beneath his heel.

"Catch me making a fool of myself again!" he growled.

"I—I did not mean it that way—really I didn't, Mr. Blake. It was the thought of that awful snake."

But Blake, cut to the quick, had turned away far too angry to heed what she said. He stopped short beside the Englishman; but only to sling the skin of honey upon his back. The load was by no means a light one, even for his strength. Yet he caught up the heavy pot as well, and made off across the plain at a pace which the others could not hope to equal.

As Winthrope rose and came forward to join Miss Leslie, he looked about closely for the bruised flower. It was nowhere in sight.

"Er—beg pardon, Miss Genevieve, but did not Blake drop the bloom—er—blossom somewhere about here?"

"Perhaps he did," replied Miss Leslie. She spoke with studied indifference.

"I—ah—saw the fellow exhibit his impudence."

"Ye-es?"

"You know, I think it high time the bounder is taken down a peg."

"Ah, indeed! Then why do you not try it?"

"Miss Genevieve! you know that at present I am physically so much his inferior—"

"How about mentally?"

Though the girl's eyes were veiled by their lashes, she saw Winthrope cast after Blake a look that seemed to her almost fiercely vindictive.

"Well?" she said, smiling, but watching him closely.

"Mentally!—We'll soon see about that!" he muttered. "I must say, Miss Genevieve, it strikes me as deuced odd, you know, to hear you speak so pleasantly of a person who—not to mention past occurrences—has to-day, with the most shocking disregard of—er—decency—"

"Stop!—stop this instant!" screamed the girl, her nerves overwrought.

Winthrope smiled with complacent assurance.

"My dear young lady," he drawled, "allow me to repeat: 'All is fair in love and war.' Believe me, I love you most ardently."

"No gentleman would press his suit at such a time as this!"

"Really now, I fancy I have always comported myself as a gentleman—"

"A trifle too much so, truth to say!" she retorted.

"Ah, indeed. However, this is now quite another matter. Has it not occurred to you, my dear, that this entire experience of ours since that beastly storm is rather—er—compromising?"

"You—you dare say such a thing! I'll go this instant and tell Mr. Blake! I'll—"

"Begging your pardon, madam—but are you prepared to marry that barbarous clodhopper?"

"Marry? What do you mean, sir?"

"Precisely that. It is a question of marriage, if you'll pardon me. And, you see, I flatter myself, that when it comes to the point, it will not be Blake, but myself—"

"Ah, indeed! And if I should prefer neither of you?"

"Begging your pardon—I fancy you will honor me with your hand, my dear. For one thing, you admit that I am a gentleman."

"Oh, indeed!"

"One moment, please! I am trying to intimate to you, as delicately as possible, how—er—embarrassing you would find it to have these little occurrences—above all, to-day's—noised abroad to the vulgar crowd, or even among your friends—"

"What do you mean? What do you want?" cried the girl, staring at him with a deepening fear in her bewildered eyes.

"Believe me, my dear, it grieves me to so perturb you; but—er—love must have its way, you know."

"You forget. There is Mr. Blake."

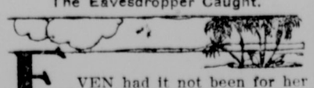
"Ah, to be sure! But really now, you would not ask, or even permit him to murder me; and one is not legally bound, you know, to observe promises—a pledge of silence, for example—when extorted under duress, under violence, you know."

Miss Leslie looked the Englishman up and down, her brown eyes sparkling with quick-returning anger. He met her scorn with a smile of smug complacency.

"Cad!" she cried, and turning her back upon him, she set out across the plain after Blake.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Eavesdropper Caught.



EVEN had it not been for her doubts of Blake, the girl's modesty would have caused her to think twice before repeating to him the Englishman's insulting proposal. While she yet hesitated and delayed, Winthrope came down with a second attack of fever. Blake, who until then had held himself sullenly apart from him as well as from Miss Leslie, at once softened to a gentler, or, at least, to a more considerate mood. Though his speech and bearing continued morose, he took upon himself all the duties of night nurse, besides working and foraging several hours each day.

Much to Miss Leslie's surprise, she found herself tending the invalid through the daytime almost as though nothing had happened. But everything about this wild and perilous life was so strange and unnatural to her that she found herself accepting the most unconventional relations as a regular consequence of the situation. She was feverishly eager for anything that might occupy her mind; for she felt that to brood over the future might mean madness. The mere thought of the possibilities was far too terrifying to be calmly dwelt upon. Though slight, there had been some little comfort in the belief that she could rely on Winthrope. But now she was left alone with her doubt and dread. Even if she had nothing to fear from Blake, there were all the savage dangers of the coast, and behind those, far worse, the fever.

Meantime Blake went about his share of the camp work, gruff and silent, but with the usual concrete results. He brought load after load of fresh cocoanuts, and took great pains to hunt out the deliciously flavored eggs of the frigate birds to tempt Winthrope's failing appetite. When Miss Leslie suggested that beef juice would be much better for the invalid than broth he went out immediately in search of a gum-bearing tree, and that night, after heating a small quantity of gum in the cigarette case with the adder poison, he spent hours replacing his arrow-heads with small barbed tips that could be loosened from their sockets by a slight pull.

A little before dawn he dipped two of his new arrow-heads in the sticky contents of the cigarette case, fitted them carefully to their shafts and stole away down the cleft. Dawn found him crouched low in the grass where the overflow from the pool ran out into the plain along its little channel. He could see large forms moving away from him; then came the flood of crimson light, and he made out that the figures were a drove of huge eland.

His eyes flashed with eagerness. It was a long shot; but he knew that no more was required than to pierce the skin on any part of his quarry's body. He put his fingers between his teeth and sent out a piercing whistle. It was a trick he had tried more than once on deer and pronghorn antelope. As he expected, the eland halted and swung half around. Their ox-like sides presented a mark hard to miss.

He rose and shot as they were wheeling to fly. Before he could fit his second arrow to the string the whole herd were running off at a lumbering gallop. He lowered his bow and walked after the animals, smiling with grim anticipation. He had seen his arrow strike against the side of the young bull at which he had aimed.

A little beyond where the bull stood he came upon the headless shaft of his arrow. As he stooped and caught it up he saw one of the fleeing animals fall. When he came up with the dead bull his first act was to recover his arrow-tip and cut out the flesh around the wound. Provided only with his weak-bladed knife, he found it no easy task to butcher so large a beast. Though he had now acquired considerable dexterity in the art, noon had passed before he brought the first load of meat up the cleft.

So great was the abundance of meat that Blake worked all the remainder of the day and all night stringing the flesh on the curing racks, and Miss Leslie tried out pot after pot of fat and tallow, until every spare vessel was filled and she had to resort to a hollow in the rock beside the spring. Blake promised to make more pots as soon as he could fetch the clay, but he had first to dress the eland hide and prepare a new stock of thread and cord from parts of the animal which he was careful not to let her see.

Whatever their concern for the future—and even Blake's was keen and bitter—the party, as a party, for the time being might have been considered extremely fortunate. They had a shelter secure alike from the weather and from wild beasts; an abundance of nutritious food, and, as material for clothing, the bushbuck, hyena and eland hides. To obtain more skins and more meat Blake now knew would be a simple matter so long as he had enough poison left in the cigarette case to moisten the tips of his arrows.

Even Winthrope's relapse proved far less serious than might reasonably have been expected. The fever soon left him and within a few days he regained strength enough to care for himself. Here, however, much to Blake's perplexity and concern, his progress seemed to stop, and all Blake's urging could do no more than cause him to move languidly from one shady spot to another. He would receive Blake's orders with a smile and a drawling "Ya-as, to be sure!"—and then absolutely ignore the matter.

Only in two ways did the invalid exhibit any signs of energy. He could and did eat with a heartiness little short of that shown by Blake, and he would insist upon seeking opportunities to press his attentions upon Miss Leslie. He was careful to avoid all offensive remarks; yet the veriest commonplace from his lips was now an offense to the girl. While he needed her as nurse she had endured his talk as part of her duty. But now she felt that she could no longer do so. Taking advantage of a time when the Englishman was, as she supposed, enjoying a noonday siesta down towards the barricade, she went to meet Blake, who had been up on the cliff for eggs.

"Hello!" he sang out, as he swung down the tree, one hand gripping the clay pot in which he had gathered the eggs. "What you doing out in the sun? Get into the shade."

She stepped into the shade and waited until he had climbed down the pile of stones which he had built for steps at the foot of the tree.

"Mr. Blake," she began, "could not I do this work—gather the eggs?"

"You could, if I'd let you, Miss Jenny. But it strikes me you've got quite enough to do. Tell you the truth, I'd like to make Win take it in hand again. But all my cussing won't budge him an inch, and, you know, when it comes to the rub, I couldn't wallop a fellow who can hardly stand up."

"Is he really so weak?" she murmured.

"Well, you know how— Say, you don't mean that you think he's shamming?"

"I did not say that I thought so, Mr. Blake. I do not care to talk about him. What I wish is that you will let me attend to this work."

"Couldn't think of it, Miss Jenny. You're already doing your share."

"Mr. Blake—if you must know, I wish to have a place where I can—and be apart—alone."

Blake scowled. "Alone with that dude! He'd soon find enough strength to climb up with you on the cliff."

"I—ah—Mr. Blake, would he be apt to follow me, if I told you distinctly I should rather be alone?"

"Would he? Well, I should rather guess not!" cried Blake, making no attempt to conceal his delight. "I'll give him a hint that'll make his hair curl. From now on, nobody climbs up this tree but you, without first asking your permission."

"You Sneak! You Sham Gent!"

"Thank you, Mr. Blake! You are very kind."

"Kind to let you do more work! But say, I'll help out all I can on the other work. You know, Miss Jenny—a rough fellow like me don't know how to say it, but he can think it just the same—I'd do anything in the world for you!"

As he spoke, he held out his rough, powerful hand. She shrank back a little and caught her breath in sudden fright. But when she met his steady gaze, her fear left her as quickly as it had come. She impulsively thrust out her hand and he seized it in a grip that brought the tears to her eyes.

"Miss Jenny! Miss Jenny!" he murmured, utterly unconscious that he was hurting her, "you know now that I'm your friend, Miss Jenny!"

"Yes, Mr. Blake," she answered, blushing and drawing her hand free. "I believe you are a friend—I believe I can trust you."

"You can, by—Jiminy! But say," he continued, blundering with dense stupidity, "do you really mean that? Can you forgive me for being so confounded meddlesome the other day after the snake—"

He stopped short, for upon the instant she was facing him, as on that eventful day, scarlet with shame and anger.

"How dare you speak of it?" she cried. "You're—you're not a gentleman!"

Before he could reply she turned and left him, walking rapidly and with her head held high. Blake stared after her in bewilderment.

"Well, what in—what in thunder have I done now?" he exclaimed. "Ladies are certainly mighty funny! To go off at a touch—and just when I thought we were going to be chums! But then, of course, I've the whole thing to learn about nice girls—like her!"

"I—ah—must certainly agree with you there, Blake," drawled Winthrope, from beside the nearest bush.

Blake turned upon him with savage fury: "You dirty sneak!—you gentleman! You've been eavesdropping!"

The Englishman's yellow face paled to a sallow mottled gray. He had seen the same look in Blake's eyes twice before, and this time Blake was far more angry.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

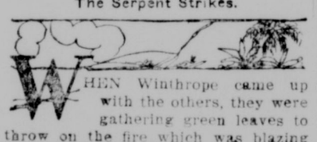
CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Serpent Strikes.



WHEN Winthrope came up with the others, they were gathering green leaves to throw on the fire which was blazing close beside the ant-hill.

"Get a move on you!" called Blake. "You're slow. Grab a bunch of leaves, and get into the smoke, if you don't want to be stung."

Winthrope neither gathered any leaves nor hurried himself, until he was visited by a highly irritated bee. Then he obeyed with alacrity. Blake was far too intent on other matters to heed the Englishman. Leaping in and out of the thick of the smoke, he pounded the ant-hill with his club, until he had broken a gaping hole into the cavity. The smoke, pouring into the hive, made short work of the bees that had not already been suffocated.

Although the antelope skin was drawn into the shape of a sack, both it and the pot were filled to overflowing with honey, and there were still more combs left than the three could eat.

Blake caught Winthrope smiling with satisfaction as he licked his fingers.

"What's the matter with my expedition now, old man?" he demanded.

"I—ah—must admit, Blake, we have had a most enjoyable change of food."

"If you are sure it will agree with you," remarked Miss Leslie.

"But I am sure of that, Miss Genevieve. I could digest anything to-day. I'm fairly ravenous."

"All the more reason to be careful," rejoined Blake. "I guess, though, what we've had'll do no harm. We'll let it settle a bit, here in the shade, and then hit the home trail."

"Could we not first go to the river, Mr. Blake? My hands are dreadfully sticky."

"Win will take you. It's only a little way to the bank here and there's not much underbrush."

"If you think it's quite safe—" remarked Winthrope.

"It's safe enough. Go on. You'll see the river in half a minute. Only thing, you'd better watch out for alligators."

"I believe that—er—properly speaking, these are crocodiles."

"You don't say! Heap of difference it will make if one gets you."

Miss Leslie caught Winthrope's eye. He turned on his heel, and led the way for her through the first thicket. Beyond this they came to a little glade which ran through to the river. When they reached the bank, they stepped cautiously down the muddy slope, and bathed their hands in the clear water. As Miss Leslie rose, Winthrope bent over and began to drink.

"Oh, Mr. Winthrope!" she exclaimed; "please don't! In your weak condition, I'm so afraid—"

"Do not alarm yourself. I am perfectly well, and I am quite as competent to judge what is good for me as your—ah—countryman."

"Mr. Winthrope, I am thinking only of your own good."

Winthrope took another deep draught, rinsed his fingers fastidiously, and arose.

"My dear Miss Genevieve," he observed, "a woman looks at these matters in such a different light from a man. But you should know that there are some things a gentleman cannot tolerate."

"Told You So! See Him Wriggle!"

"You were welcome to all the water in the flask. Surely with that you could have waited, if only to please me."

"Ah, if you put it that way, I must beg pardon. Anything to please you, I'm sure! Pray forgive me, and forget the incident. It is now past."

"I hope so!" she murmured; but her heart sank as she glanced at his sallow face, and she recalled his languid, feeble movements.

Piqued by her look, Winthrope started back through the glade. Miss Leslie was turning to follow, when she caught sight of a gorgeous crimson blossom under the nearest tree. It was the first flower she had seen since being shipwrecked. She uttered a little cry of delight, and ran to pluck the blossom.

Winthrope, glancing about at her exclamation, saw her stoop over the flower—and in the same instant he saw a huge, vivid coil, all black and green and yellow, flash up out of the bedded leaves and strike against the girl. She staggered back, screaming with horror, yet seemed unable to run.

Winthrope swung up his stick, and dashed across the glade toward her.

"What is it—a snake?" he cried.

The girl did not seem to hear him. She had ceased screaming, and stood rigid with fright, glaring down at the ground before her. In a moment Winthrope was near enough to make out the brilliant glistening body, now extended full length in the grass. It was nearly five feet long and thick as his thigh. Another step, and he saw the hideous triangular head, lifted a few inches on the thick neck. The cold eyes were fixed upon the girl in a malignant, deadly stare.

"Snake! snake!" he yelled, and thrust his cane at the reptile's tail.

Again came a flashing leap of the beautiful ornate coil, and the stick was struck from Winthrope's hand. He danced backward, wild with excitement.

"Snake!—Hi, Blake! monster!—Run, Miss Leslie! I'll hold him—I'll get another stick!"

He darted aside to catch up a branch, and then ran in and struck boldly at the adder, which reared hissing to meet him. But the blow fell short, and the rotten wood shattered on the ground. Again Winthrope ran aside for a stick. There was none near, and as he paused to glance about, Blake came sprinting down the glade.

"Where?" he shouted.

"There—Hi! look out! You'll be on him!"

Blake stopped short, barely beyond striking distance of the hissing reptile.

"Wow!" he yelled. "Puff adder! I'll fix him."

He leaped back, and thrust his bow at the snake. The challenge was met by a vicious lunge. Even where he stood Winthrope heard the thud of the reptile's head upon the ground.

"Now, once more, tootsie!" mocked Blake, swinging up his club.

Again the adder struck at the bow tip, more viciously than before. With the flash of the stroke, Blake's right foot thrust forward, and his club came down with all the drive of his sinewy arm behind it. The blow fell across the thickest part of the adder's outstretched body.

"Told you so! See him wiggle!" shouted Blake. "Broke his back, first lick— What's the matter, Miss Jenny? He can't do anything now."

Miss Leslie did not answer. She stood rigid, her face ashy-gray, her dilated eyes fixed upon the writhing, hissing adder.

"I think the snake struck her!" gasped Winthrope, suddenly overcome with horror.

"God!" cried Blake. He dropped his club, and rushed to the girl. In a moment he had knelt before and flung up her leopard-skin skirt. Her stockings ripped to shreds in his frantic grasp. There, a little below her right knee, was a tiny, red wound. Blake put his lips to it, and sucked with fierce energy.

Then the girl found her voice.

"Go away—go away! How dare you!" she cried, as her face flushed scarlet.

Blake turned, spat, and burst out with a loud demand of Winthrope: "Quick! the little knife—I'll have to slash it! Ten times worse than a rattlesnake— Lord! you're slow—I'll use mine!"

"Let go of me—let go! What do you mean, sir?" cried the girl, struggling to free herself.

"Hold still, you little fool!" he shouted. "It's death—sure death, if I don't get the poison from that bite!"

"I'm not bitten— Let go, I say! It struck in the fold of my skirt."

"For God's sake, Jenny, don't lie! It's certain death! I saw the mark—"

"That was a thorn. I drew it out an hour ago."

Blake looked up into her hazel eyes. They were blazing with indignant scorn. He freed her, and rose with clumsy slowness. Again he glanced at her quivering, scarlet face, only to look away with a sheepish expression.

"I guess you think I'm just a damned meddlesome idiot," he mumbled.

She did not answer. He stood for a little, rubbing a finger across his sun-blistered lips. Suddenly he stopped and looked at the finger. It was streaked with blood.

"Whew!" he exclaimed. "Didn't stop to think of that! It's just as well for me, Miss Jenny, that wasn't an adder bite. A little poison on my sore lip would have done for me. Ten to one, we'd both have turned up our toes at the same time. Of course, though, that'd be nothing to you."

Miss Leslie put her hands before her face and burst into hysterical weeping.

Blake looked around, far more alarmed than when facing the adder.

"Here, you blooming lud!" he shouted; "take the lady away, and be quick about it. She'll go dotty if she sees any more snake stunts. Clear out with her, while I smash the wriggler."

Winthrope, who had been staring fixedly at the beautiful coloring and loathsome form of the writhing adder, started at Blake's harsh command as though struck.

"I—er—to be sure," he stammered, and darting around to the hysterical girl, he took her arm and hurried her away up the glade.

They had gone several paces when Blake came running up behind them. Winthrope looked back with a glance of inquiry. Blake shook his head.

"Not yet," he said. "Give me your cigarette case. I've thought of something— Hold on; take out the cigarettes. Smoke 'em, if you like."

Case in hand, Blake returned to the wounded adder, and picked up his club. A second smashing blow would have ended the matter at once; but Blake did not strike. Instead, he fainted with his club until he managed to pin down the venomous head. The club lay across the monster's neck, and he held it fast with the pressure of his foot.

When, half an hour later, he wiped his knife on a wisp of grass and stood up, the cigarette case contained over a tablespoonful of a crystalline liquid. He peered in at it, his heavy jaw thrust out, his eyes glowing with savage elation.

"Talk about your meat trusts and Winchesters!" he exulted; "here's a whole carload of beef in this little box—enough dope to morgue a herd of steers. Good God, though, that was a close shave for her!"

His face sobered, and he stood for several moments staring thoughtfully into space. Then his gaze chanced to fall upon the great crimson blossom which had so nearly lured the girl to her death.

"Hello!" he exclaimed; "that's an amaryllis. Wonder if she wasn't coming to pick it—" He snapped shut the lid of the cigarette case, thrust it carefully into his shirt pocket, and stepped forward to pluck the flower. "Makes a fellow feel like a kid; but maybe it'll make her feel less sore at me."

He stood gazing at the flower for several moments, his eyes aglow with a soft blue light.

"Whew!" he sighed; "if only— But what's the use? She's 'way out of my class—a rough brute like me! All the same, it's up to me to take care of her. She can't keep me from being her friend—and she sure can't object to my picking flowers for her."

Amaryllis in hand, he gathered up his bow and club. Then he paused to study the skin of the decapitated adder. The inspection ended with a shake of his head.

"Better not, Thomas. It would make a dandy quiver; but then, it might get on her nerves."

When he came to the ant-hill, he found companions and honey alike gone. He went on to the cocoanuts. There he came upon Winthrope stretched flat beside the skin of honey. Miss Leslie was seated a little way beyond, nervously bending a palm-leaf into shape for a hat.

"I say, Blake," drawled Winthrope, "you've been a deuced long time in coming. It was no end of a task to lug the honey—"

Blake brushed past without replying, and went on until he stood before the girl. As she glanced up at him, he held out the crimson blossom.

"Thought you might like posies," he said, in a hesitating voice.

Instead of taking the flower, she drew back with a gesture of repulsion.

"Oh, take it away!" she exclaimed.

Blake flung the rejected gift on the ground, and crushed it beneath his heel.

"Catch me making a fool of myself again!" he growled.

"I—I did not mean it that way—really I didn't, Mr. Blake. It was the thought of that awful snake."

But Blake, cut to the quick, had turned away far too angry to heed what she said. He stopped short beside the Englishman; but only to sling the skin of honey upon his back. The load was by no means a light one, even for his strength. Yet he caught up the heavy pot as well, and made off across the plain at a pace which the others could not hope to equal.

As Winthrope rose and came forward to join Miss Leslie, he looked about closely for the bruised flower. It was nowhere in sight.

"Er—beg pardon, Miss Genevieve, but did not Blake drop the bloom—er—blossom somewhere about here?"

"Perhaps he did," replied Miss Leslie. She spoke with studied indifference.

"I—ah—saw the fellow exhibit his impudence."

"Ye-es?"

"You know, I think it high time the bounder is taken down a peg."

"Ah, indeed! Then why do you not try it?"

"Miss Genevieve! you know that at present I am physically so much his inferior—"

"How about mentally?"

Though the girl's eyes were veiled by their lashes, she saw Winthrope cast after Blake a look that seemed to her almost fiercely vindictive.

"Well?" she said, smiling, but watching him closely.

"Mentally!—We'll soon see about that!" he muttered. "I must say, Miss Genevieve, it strikes me as deuced odd, you know, to hear you speak so pleasantly of a person who—not to mention past occurrences—has to-day, with the most shocking disregard of—er—decency—"

"Stop!—stop this instant!" screamed the girl, her nerves overwrought.

Winthrope smiled with complacent assurance.

"My dear young lady," he drawled, "allow me to repeat: 'All is fair in love and war.' Believe me, I love you most ardently."

"No gentleman would press his suit at such a time as this!"

"Really now, I fancy I have always comported myself as a gentleman—"

"A trifle too much so, truth to say!" she retorted.

"Ah, indeed. However, this is now quite another matter. Has it not occurred to you, my dear, that this entire experience of ours since that beastly storm is rather—er—compromising?"

"You—you dare say such a thing! I'll go this instant and tell Mr. Blake! I'll—"

"Begging your pardon, madam—but are you prepared to marry that barbarous clodhopper?"

"Marry? What do you mean, sir?"

"Precisely that. It is a question of marriage, if you'll pardon me. And, you see, I flatter myself, that when it comes to the point, it will not be Blake, but myself—"

"Ah, indeed! And if I should prefer neither of you?"

"Begging your pardon—I fancy you will honor me with your hand, my dear. For one thing, you admit that I am a gentleman."

"Oh, indeed!"

"One moment, please! I am trying to intimate to you, as delicately as possible, how—er—embarrassing you would find it to have these little occurrences—above all, to-day's—noised abroad to the vulgar crowd, or even among your friends—"

"What do you mean? What do you want?" cried the girl, staring at him with a deepening fear in her bewildered eyes.

"Believe me, my dear, it grieves me to so perturb you; but—er—love must have its way, you know."

"You forget. There is Mr. Blake."

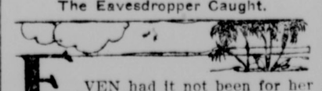
"Ah, to be sure! But really now, you would not ask, or even permit him to murder me; and one is not legally bound, you know, to observe promises—a pledge of silence, for example—when extorted under duress, under violence, you know."

Miss Leslie looked the Englishman up and down, her brown eyes sparkling with quick-returning anger. He met her scorn with a smile of smug complacency.

"Cad!" she cried, and turning her back upon him, she set out across the plain after Blake.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Eavesdropper Caught.



EVEN had it not been for her doubts of Blake, the girl's modesty would have caused her to think twice before repeating to him the Englishman's insulting proposal. While she yet hesitated and delayed, Winthrope came down with a second attack of fever. Blake, who until then had held himself sullenly apart from him as well as from Miss Leslie, at once softened to a gentler, or, at least, to a more considerate mood. Though his speech and bearing continued morose, he took upon himself all the duties of night nurse, besides working and foraging several hours each day.

Much to Miss Leslie's surprise, she found herself tending the invalid through the daytime almost as though nothing had happened. But everything about this wild and perilous life was so strange and unnatural to her that she found herself accepting the most unconventional relations as a regular consequence of the situation. She was feverishly eager for anything that might occupy her mind; for she felt that to brood over the future might mean madness. The mere thought of the possibilities was far too terrifying to be calmly dwelt upon. Though slight, there had been some little comfort in the belief that she could rely on Winthrope. But now she was left alone with her doubt and dread. Even if she had nothing to fear from Blake, there were all the savage dangers of the coast, and behind those, far worse, the fever.

Meantime Blake went about his share of the camp work, gruff and silent, but with the usual concrete results. He brought load after load of fresh cocoanuts, and took great pains to hunt out the deliciously flavored eggs of the frigate birds to tempt Winthrope's failing appetite. When Miss Leslie suggested that beef juice would be much better for the invalid than broth he went out immediately in search of a gum-bearing tree, and that night, after heating a small quantity of gum in the cigarette case with the adder poison, he spent hours replacing his arrow-heads with small barbed tips that could be loosened from their sockets by a slight pull.

A little before dawn he dipped two of his new arrow-heads in the sticky contents of the cigarette case, fitted them carefully to their shafts and stole away down the cleft. Dawn found him crouched low in the grass where the overflow from the pool ran out into the plain along its little channel. He could see large forms moving away from him; then came the flood of crimson light, and he made out that the figures were a drove of huge eland.

His eyes flashed with eagerness. It was a long shot; but he knew that no more was required than to pierce the skin on any part of his quarry's body. He put his fingers between his teeth and sent out a piercing whistle. It was a trick he had tried more than once on deer and pronghorn antelope. As he expected, the eland halted and swung half around. Their ox-like sides presented a mark hard to miss.

He rose and shot as they were wheeling to fly. Before he could fit his second arrow to the string the whole herd were running off at a lumbering gallop. He lowered his bow and walked after the animals, smiling with grim anticipation. He had seen his arrow strike against the side of the young bull at which he had aimed.

A little beyond where the bull stood he came upon the headless shaft of his arrow. As he stooped and caught it up he saw one of the fleeing animals fall. When he came up with the dead bull his first act was to recover his arrow-tip and cut out the flesh around the wound. Provided only with his weak-bladed knife, he found it no easy task to butcher so large a beast. Though he had now acquired considerable dexterity in the art, noon had passed before he brought the first load of meat up the cleft.

So great was the abundance of meat that Blake worked all the remainder of the day and all night stringing the flesh on the curing racks, and Miss Leslie tried out pot after pot of fat and tallow, until every spare vessel was filled and she had to resort to a hollow in the rock beside the spring. Blake promised to make more pots as soon as he could fetch the clay, but he had first to dress the eland hide and prepare a new stock of thread and cord from parts of the animal which he was careful not to let her see.

Whatever their concern for the future—and even Blake's was keen and bitter—the party, as a party, for the time being might have been considered extremely fortunate. They had a shelter secure alike from the weather and from wild beasts; an abundance of nutritious food, and, as material for clothing, the bushbuck, hyena and eland hides. To obtain more skins and more meat Blake now knew would be a simple matter so long as he had enough poison left in the cigarette case to moisten the tips of his arrows.

Even Winthrope's relapse proved far less serious than might reasonably have been expected. The fever soon left him and within a few days he regained strength enough to care for himself. Here, however, much to Blake's perplexity and concern, his progress seemed to stop, and all Blake's urging could do no more than cause him to move languidly from one shady spot to another. He would receive Blake's orders with a smile and a drawling "Ya-as, to be sure!"—and then absolutely ignore the matter.

Only in two ways did the invalid exhibit any signs of energy. He could and did eat with a heartiness little short of that shown by Blake, and he would insist upon seeking opportunities to press his attentions upon Miss Leslie. He was careful to avoid all offensive remarks; yet the veriest commonplace from his lips was now an offense to the girl. While he needed her as nurse she had endured his talk as part of her duty. But now she felt that she could no longer do so. Taking advantage of a time when the Englishman was, as she supposed, enjoying a noonday siesta down towards the barricade, she went to meet Blake, who had been up on the cliff for eggs.

"Hello!" he sang out, as he swung down the tree, one hand gripping the clay pot in which he had gathered the eggs. "What you doing out in the sun? Get into the shade."

She stepped into the shade and waited until he had climbed down the pile of stones which he had built for steps at the foot of the tree.

"Mr. Blake," she began, "could not I do this work—gather the eggs?"

"You could, if I'd let you, Miss Jenny. But it strikes me you've got quite enough to do. Tell you the truth, I'd like to make Win take it in hand again. But all my cussing won't budge him an inch, and, you know, when it comes to the rub, I couldn't wallop a fellow who can hardly stand up."

"Is he really so weak?" she murmured.

"Well, you know how— Say, you don't mean that you think he's shamming?"

"I did not say that I thought so, Mr. Blake. I do not care to talk about him. What I wish is that you will let me attend to this work."

"Couldn't think of it, Miss Jenny. You're already doing your share."

"Mr. Blake—if you must know, I wish to have a place where I can—and be apart—alone."

Blake scowled. "Alone with that dude! He'd soon find enough strength to climb up with you on the cliff."

"I—ah—Mr. Blake, would he be apt to follow me, if I told you distinctly I should rather be alone?"

"Would he? Well, I should rather guess not!" cried Blake, making no attempt to conceal his delight. "I'll give him a hint that'll make his hair curl. From now on, nobody climbs up this tree but you, without first asking your permission."

"Thank you, Mr. Blake! You are very kind."

"Kind to let you do more work! But say, I'll help out all I can on the other work. You know, Miss Jenny—a rough fellow like me don't know how to say it, but he can think it just the same—I'd do anything in the world for you!"

As he spoke, he held out his rough, powerful hand. She shrank back a little and caught her breath in sudden fright. But when she met his steady gaze, her fear left her as quickly as it had come. She impulsively thrust out her hand and he seized it in a grip that brought the tears to her eyes.

"Miss Jenny! Miss Jenny!" he murmured, utterly unconscious that he was hurting her, "you know now that I'm your friend, Miss Jenny!"

"Yes, Mr. Blake," she answered, blushing and drawing her hand free. "I believe you are a friend—I believe I can trust you."

"You can, by—Jiminy! But say," he continued, blundering with dense stupidity, "do you really mean that? Can you forgive me for being so confounded meddlesome the other day after the snake—"

He stopped short, for upon the instant she was facing him, as on that eventful day, scarlet with shame and anger.

"How dare you speak of it?" she cried. "You're—you're not a gentleman!"

Before he could reply she turned and left him, walking rapidly and with her head held high. Blake stared after her in bewilderment.

"Well, what in—what in thunder have I done now?" he exclaimed. "Ladies are certainly mighty funny! To go off at a touch—and just when I thought we were going to be chums! But then, of course, I've the whole thing to learn about nice girls—like her!"

"I—ah—must certainly agree with you there, Blake," drawled Winthrope, from beside the nearest bush.

Blake turned upon him with savage fury: "You dirty sneak!—you gentleman! You've been eavesdropping!"

The Englishman's yellow face paled to a sallow mottled gray. He had seen the same look in Blake's eyes twice before, and this time Blake was far more angry.

"You Sneak! You Sham Gent!"

Incidents In Washington's Life.

Though the pages of American history are adorned with the names of many great men, none are brighter and more beautifully described in letters of chased gold than those of Washington and Lincaln. Students of history are divided in their judgment which of the two men is the greater. But it is not really important that this question be decided. Destiny planned a certain line of work for both men, and they did that work well. Their innate ability is only partly responsible for their success; it was their unselfishness and desire to do well whatever they undertook which helped them to succeed where others might have failed. If Lincoln deserves praise because necessity spurred him on to greatness, Washington deserves as much credit because he became great without being driven by necessity. Destiny demanded a double role of Washington—she made him a soldier and a statesman, and he performed both well. His trials as president were almost as great as those he encountered as commander-in-chief of the army. He was placed at the head of a new form of government, and did not have precedents to guide him in his undertaking. It was his early training which taught him to think calmly and with judgment. His mind once made up, to act without fear.

He was born on the banks of the Potomac river in a farmhouse; though the house was far better than a log cabin, it was not the mansion it is supposed to have been. It was a large, roomy place, with a deep sloping roof and a big outside chimney at either end. He was one of many children. His father was rich in crops and land, though he had little real money. Most Virginia farmers planted tobacco, and when money was scarce they traded this product for food and clothing. His early years were spent on the farm, with plenty of exercise and little schooling. George loved to tramp across the fields, forests and to swim in the streams. His education was gained at a country school where he was taught for three hours a day. Limited as was his education, he was fond of reading, and he had a book into which he copied everything he wished to remember. In this book he put many rules which he himself had formulated. These are only a few of the many:

"Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire called conscience."

"Think before you speak."

"Whisper not in the company of others."

Lawrence, one of the half-brothers, had been sent to England to school, and the parents had planned the same for George, but the father died suddenly, and Mrs. Washington realized she could not afford to send him across the ocean. The boy had spent considerable time on the wharf and talking to seamen had awakened a desire for adventure. These stories created a desire to earn a living as a sailor, and he suggested it to his mother. Mrs. Washington did not like the idea of having George leave home nor did she approve of his career. He was sent back to school to study surveying. When not studying he was drilling his company of boys to become soldiers, and he often got very impatient when they made mistakes.

Shortly after his brother Lawrence had married the daughter of Lord Fairfax a member of this family took a great interest in the boy. He had such a fancy for the lad that he put him to surveying a large tract of land in the Shenandoah valley. Though the work was no easy task, he was so strong and enthusiastic he acquitted himself exceedingly well. He did not go alone—a boy, George Fairfax, went as his aid. They rather enjoyed the new experience of hunger, cold and facing Indian strategy. In later years George recalled his experience of roughing it in the Shenandoah valley with great pleasure. This work was suddenly interrupted by sickness in the family. Lawrence, his half-brother, was ill and the physicians sent him to the West Indies. George went along to keep him company, only to be taken with smallpox. Although Lawrence started for home, he died after his return.

This was a great shock to George, for the brothers were exceedingly devoted; but the sting of this loss was partly forgotten by a commission to go to the French who were building forts on English territory. He was made major at the age of 22 and sent on a perilous journey of over a thousand miles. He had many narrow escapes in his journey over mountains, fording streams and through forests where Indians lay in hiding. After his interview with the French commander he started for home. The journey back was worse than going, for the rivers were exceedingly treacherous. The French governor refused to heed English commands and continued to build forts, so George Washington was appointed to command soldiers to march against the French in the spring. This was the beginning of a war between the French and English, which lasted seven years. Gen. Braddock was sent over from England and George was made a colonel and commanded the Virginia troops. Though Braddock was a capable general, he did not understand the art of fighting the Indians and refused to heed young Washington's advice. The general was shot in one of these engagements. With this the Redcoats began to run, but Washington tried to call them back. All day he was in the midst of the fight. Four bullets went through his coat and two horses were shot under him.

The war at an end, Washington returned home. He was very anxious to see his mother, whom he had not seen in some time. Though Mrs. Washington was not a brilliant woman, she had plenty of good judgment and common sense, and was always ready to give her son wise counsel. Proud though she was of her boy's energy and desire to serve his country she was careful not to spoil him by excessive praise. She loved to hear of the hazards of war, but she emphasized the dangers more than her boy's success.

Hardships and long-fought campaigns had done much to impair his health and he went to Williamsburg to consult a physician. On this trip he met Mrs. Martha Custis, widow of Daniel Parks Custis, one of the wealthiest planters in the colony. They were married some five months later. Very little is known of her except that she was petite, pretty and exceedingly devoted to her husband. She was very proud of his successes, and used all her energy to make his trials as easy as she could. There are those who attribute Washington's first step upward to his marriage. This is certainly untrue, for he was on the road to success when he married her. Whenever Washington went on a long campaign his wife took up headquarters where she might be near him. These winterings gradually became a regular custom. She seldom complained, although she frequently had to put up with inconvenient headquarters. When Washington was chosen commander-in-chief of the army he did not accept the place with great eagerness, for he knew it was to be a long and hard fought war, and a position latent with responsibility. The struggle was as difficult as he imagined, for many times during the war the soldiers were ready to lay down their arms and go home, but his courage never failed him and he pushed on.

When the sky looked blackest he would plan some campaign to make of defeat a victory A happy illustration of this was when one Christmas night the soldiers were quite ready to give up and go home. They were camping on the banks of the Delaware. Pointing to the other side, he said: "Our enemy is camping there." They were Hessian soldiers, and since it was Christmas night, they were celebrating. It was with difficulty the army crossed, for the night was wild, dark and cold. But in spite of the great blocks of ice on the river, Washington managed to get his army across, and a victory was the result. A more difficult year was spent in Valley Forge. It was a long, cold winter, the soldiers hungry for food, and they did not have enough clothing and blankets to keep themselves warm. Many times they were on the verge of mutineering. It was only by means of his tact and good judgment that he brought harmony into camp and gave the war a successful ending.

After leaving the army he went back home and spent much time improving his farm. The Mount Vernon estate gradually became an expensive affair. Here he kept open house, and never a day went by without his receiving callers and friends. Some of the dinners and levees were often elaborate and he struggled hard not to appear bored. He had hoped to spend the rest of his life among these pleasant surroundings. He often told his friends: "Let those who wish such things as office be at the head of things. I do not wish them. All I desire now is to settle down at Mount Vernon and to enjoy my farm." But after the constitution was ratified and the votes of the electors were opened and counted it was found that everyone had voted for Washington. During his presidency he had many knotty problems, but he met them all with good sense and judgment. Because he played the double role of commander of the army and the first president of this nation equally well he is entitled to the name, the Father of His Country.

THE AUTOMOBILIST MUST PAY HIS FULL SHARE.

Colonel Swan may have the automobilists against him—though it is to be hoped not—in his effort to make them contribute fairly to the fund for road maintenance; but he will have pretty nearly everybody else enthusiastically back of him. The argument that it is double taxation to tax the machine as personal property and then to impose a license fee for road maintenance is brought up, we believe, wherever it is proposed to make the machines pay for the damage they do. There is one thing certain: Whether it can be legally done or not, automobilists ought to be more than willing to stand a charge for road maintenance.

So long as this State was doing practically nothing in the way of roadbuilding there was little clamor for a heavy charge on automobiles. Now that we are starting in upon an expenditure of $5,000,000 for road improvements, owners of automobiles ought to submit gracefully to whatever is fair and reasonable.

There is no doubt that they do much damage to the roads. Authorities are agreed in saying that automobiles have the effect of making the road disintegrate very rapidly. The tax imposed upon them will not make good the damage they do; it will but partly recoup the State for the wear and tear. With the increase of the good roads there will be a great increase in the use of them by automobilists, and it is important that the public should not become prejudiced against the State going ahead with the work on the ground that the automobilist, who gets the most good out of them, pays little or nothing for their upkeep.

The New York Tribune, discussing this point, says it is gradually being realized that our whole system of road construction must be changed to a much more costly plan owing to the fact that the ordinary road will not stand the wear of the automobile. No one demands that the automobile shall pay all the cost of the upkeep of the roads. The fact is recognized that the very use of the highways by the automobile gives additional value to the farm lands which border upon them; but it is indisputable that the automobile has added a new and serious charge to road maintenance, and it must shoulder a reasonable part of it.—Baltimore News.

BALTIMORE'S CLAIM.

It is impossible to give Baltimore larger representation at Annapolis without increasing the size of the legislature unless the counties consent that their representation be reduced. We may as well face the fact at the outset that the counties will not consent to have their representation cut down. The question that remains is this: Are the arguments against an increase of the members of the House of Delegates and the Senate strong enough to offset the reasons advanced for an increase in Baltimore's representation? We do not think so. This is one argument against Baltimore's demand that should be met frankly at the beginning. There are objections to increasing the membership of the legislature. There are objections to piling up additional expense on the State for the legislative session, though proper economy will make the larger body less expensive than the present one. There are reasons to be urged against having a legislative body so large that it will be unwieldy. But the evils which the city suffers from owing to unfair representation at the capital are so serious, the need of having its interests better looked after is so imperative that it cannot permit objections of this sort to stand in the way of the reform it demands.—Baltimore News.

If Baltimore's claims to greater representation in the legislature were not so glaringly political the people of the counties might be disposed to concede an additional representative or two. As the matter now stands Baltimore City comes very near running things at Annapolis to suit itself, and with a larger representation the city would need but one of its adjacent counties, Baltimore county for instance, to enable it to control legislation for the entire state. The people of the counties are justly proud of its great metropolis and there is no danger of the city suffering from lack of interest in any plan for its commercial up-lift. The statute books of the state are filled with all kinds of laws in aid of Baltimore's domestic and business interest. The counties have from time immemorial acquiesced in the state's generosity toward the city. Baltimore has no reason to complain against the counties on this score. We do not know what evils "the city suffers from owing to unfair representation at the capitol," evils that militate against its commercial growth or in any way hamper its interests as a great center of manufacture and trade. When Baltimore City can convince the people of the counties that its object and sole purpose for asking a larger representation at Annapolis is purely for commercial reasons and not for greater political power, Baltimore will be given a respectful hearing from Somerset to Garrett counties.

MR TAFT'S speechmaking from New Orleans to Birmingham on Saturday revealed him to the people of three Southern States in the light of an agreeable, forceful and interesting extemporanous speaker. His audiences were appreciative and glad to hear him talk, and Mr. Taft was witty, humorous, patriotic, practical and instructive by turns. At Hattiesburg, Miss., he impressed upon his hearers as representatives not only of the South but also as Americans in the broader sense their indentification with the national Government—their share and interest in it equally with the citizens of other States. "If ever an opportunity occurs again," he said, "it will gratify me to come down here to Hattiesburg and say to its people, 'Come up to Washington and we will give you the right hand of fellowship and will show you that you own just as much of the White House and have as much right to call on the President—and, indeed, on the woman who occupies it and runs it—as anybody.'" Thus Mr. Taft talked himself into the hearts of his Southern fellow-citizens, impressing them, as, indeed, he does all with whom he is brought into contact with his sincerity and genial good nature. His address to the veterans at the Confederate Home in New Orleans was manly, broad-minded and patriotic.

JAPAN SEES A JOKE.

It has often been alleged that a racial defect of the Japanese is their lack of humor, that they take themselves too seriously and expect others to do the same. Ample refutation of this theory is afforded by the crusade which has just been commenced by the "Yorodzu Chooo" and other Japanese journals against the silk hat. The ground for their opposition is simply that the stovepipe is a ridiculous institution which ought to be abolished and that it should not be countenanced by any nation with pretensions to progress and enlightenment. Englishmen wear the silk hat on every occasion, grave and gay, because their grandfathers did, but up-to-date folk refuse to be ruled by an absurd precedent. At the risk of spoiling the Anglo-Japanese entente, the newspapers of Tokyo are throwing weighty rhetorical brickbats at the high hat, dear to the heart and expensive to the pocketbook of every Englishman. The antiquated headgear is characterized as "ill-proportioned, laughter-provoking, unsanitary, jarring to esthetic natures and a representation of superficial civilization." It is declared to be especially inappropriate to Japanese with their low stature. "Why our countrymen, who are famous for their artistic taste, should have come to adopt this monstrosity," remarks the Yorodzu, "is past our comprehension."

Here is one matter on which America and Japan can shake hands. Except for purely formal occasions, the stovepipe has fallen into disfavor in this country. A glance at photographs of the civil war period shows that the silk hat was then the black badge of respectability. The Yankees of the Orient as well as of the Occident are evidently in the procession of progress and perhaps they will be able to induce their British partners to join them. A home journal recently contained directions for making neat little wastebaskets out of old silk hats. The information should be widely diffused. The privilege of wearing ridiculous millinery ought to be confined exclusively to femininity

HAVE THE POLITICIANS THE GIFT OF PROPHECY?

In the discussion of the disfranchising amendment we hear a great deal of glib talk about how the white vote will "split up" if the negro vote is only got out of the way; of an ideal condition when both parties will put up men of the highest type, and when, casting aside all notions of partisanship, Democrats and Republicans will rush to the polls demanding to know but one thing, and that is, "Who is the best man?"

It is possible that these political prophets are genuine seers and that the political millenium they predict will come about. But we are quite unable to see why there is reason to expect Maryland Democrats to be specially given to independent voting when they find themselves in control of the State. One seldom picks up a report of a committee appointed to study national, state or municipal reforms that he does not come across the evidence of the great difficulty in getting men—good citizens—to break away from party lines. A very able commission that has spent two years studying the municipal government of Boston and seeking remedies for some of the evils finds partisanship the real bane of good government. The report says: "The indifference of well-meaning citizens, the blindness of honest partisans, the cowardice and selfishness of those most favored by wealth or education combine to create a doubt whether government by the people can succeed in cities." The same old story: Refusal to break away from party lines. Yet there is no negro vote worth talking about in Boston—a few thousand at most. Why will men leave parties here more readily than in Boston?

Independent voting has been a thing of slow growth. It is possible the elimination of the negro may work the kind of miracle that Democratic politicians say it will, but two things are undisputable: One is the Democratic party is not disfranchising the negro to accomplish any such result. The other is political experience nowhere shows that increasing the majority of the dominant party makes the electorate more independent.

BITTINGER.

This week began with extremely mild weather conditions and occasional light showers. On Monday the temperature rose to within 14 degrees of summer heat, and progressive manufacturers of maple sugar were busy getting their camps in readiness for the season's run which is expected to begin soon.

Mrs. Katherine Brenneman moved into the new house recently built by her son, Thomas H. Brenneman, last week, and as a result the old Jefferson Broadwater farm is untenanted.

Messrs. Urner and Christian Beachy, who are employed by A. Murray near Frankville, were visiting relatives here this week.

Leonard Stark returned to his home at this place from Jenningston, W. Va., last week and will help his brother Noah operate Elias Orendorf's sugar camp this season.

Robert and George Reckner and sisters, Estelle and Carrie, accompanied by Misses Sallie Beckman and Ida Lohr, all of North Glade, were visitors to this village last Saturday and Sunday.

W. A. Althers and wife, of Sunnyside, are spending this week with relatives in this section.

Mrs. H. S. Boucher, of near Rockwood, Pa., is the guest of her sister, Mrs. C. E. Ellithorp, in this village.

P. Y. Lohr, of Oakland, was a pleasant visitor among us last week.

Merchant O. C. Buckle's little "yaller" dog goes about with a dejected air and a melancholy and forsaken expression of countenance and he howls away the midnight hours in utter loneliness of spirit, and he has told all his "yaller" and spotted and black and brindle dog neighbors that it is all because Mr. Stork brought a little heir presumptive to the Buckle home last week and "daddy" has changed his hunting song to a lullaby.

GORTNER.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Althers are spending a few weeks with relatives at Bittinger.

Mrs. Lydia Tyce and Mrs. Mary Bender of St. Paul, Pa., were calling on their sister, Mrs. L. J. Swartzentruber, last week,

John Kinsinger and son Noah of Meyersdale, Pa., are calling on their many friends at this place.

Floyd, youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Swartzentruber, who died on last Saturday night after only a few days illness of diphtheretic membranous croup, was buried on the S. J. Lichty farm Tuesday morning.

J. W. Baker who was painfully injured by being kicked by a horse last Monday, is improving slowly.

Guy Sander and Miss Bertha Schlossnagle were calling on relatives at Brookside, W. Va., last Sunday.

Mose Beachy, of Niverton, Pa., is spending a few days with relatives here.

Preaching next Sunday at 10 a. m., by the German Baptist Brethern.

Lynch Talk Against Italians.

There is bitter feeling at Clarksburg against Italians because early Sunday morning, two Italians, Carl and Dominick Airotirro, stabbed Jesse Watkins, who previously had had a quarrel with Samuel Henderson. The incident was thought closed, however, when Watkins, who was approaching the depot to return to his home at Monongah, was set upon by the two Italians from behind and stabbed twice. He is thought to be mortally wounded. In the meantime a crowd of several hundred collected and cried, "Lynch the Italians," "Hang them up," etc. The men were hurried to jail. Watkins, who is 34 years old and married, is stabbed in the lung and the stomach. There has been feeling against Italians since Frank Lover, an Italian, killed Frank Whitehair in a political quarrel on the street in Clarksburg last fall.

Hot Turkey Supper.

The ladies of the Oakland Presbyterian church will serve a hot turkey supper this evening in the supper room of the Lutheran church to which all are cordially invited. With the turkey an elaborate menu will also be served. Ice cream and cake will be on the bill of fare.

SEED CORN FOR SALE—Pure bred Yellow Dent selected seed corn. First prize winner at Maryland State Corn Show at Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore, Md., Dec. 3, 1908. Also pure bred Boone Co., white corn, the variety that produced the first prize winner in white corn. Early maturing. A. B. Twining, Forest Hill, Md. 46-8t.pd.

PLEASANT VALLEY.

This section has been visited by a very warm wave for the last few days. Those who hold the superstitious idea that the the groundhog has the second day of February on which he bases his forecast of weather for the next six weeks following that date had better have Mr. Woodchuck produce or sign over the papers.

The Yonker Bros. are sawing the R. H. Gordon timber three miles south of Mt. Lake Park.

Calvin Cuppett and family moved to the farm owned by Cuppett & Leighton, former owner J. L. Paugh. The present occupant had a hearty welcome into our midst.

Frederick Gortner expects to occupy the farm he purchased of J. Meese about April first. Come on, Frederick.

A fine chance to have make some maple sugar has passed but where is the sugar?

Last Saturday evening a man was seen by the wayside lying as much on his face as on his side and with a bottle visible. Indications are he was too heavy ladened. The people of this section should take better care of their hogs than to let them lay along the public highway and the whiskey dealers should take better care of their kind.

Some of the farmers are plowing. Success to the merry old farmer who sings at the tail of his plow and scatter the seed for his harvest and takes good care of his frow.

Insurance Will Be Paid.

By the terms of the policy of life insurance carried in the Maryland Life Insurance Company of Baltimore by the late William A. DeWitt, Mrs. Walter Collier of Friendsville, a sister of Mr. DeWitt, will be paid the full amount of the policy within a few days, she being the beneficiary named in the policy. Mr. R. C. McCandlish is the local representative of the life insurance company issuing the policy.

Testing Whiskey in Saloons.

A number of revenue officers and inspectors are at work engaged in an examination and inspection of whiskey and other intoxicating beverages in the saloons at Clarksburg. Bonded whiskey in bottles in particular is being tested, with a view of ascertaining whether it is of the required proof and sold as the original. There is a feeling of anxiety among the saloon keepers.

Will Address Teachers' Association.

Mr. Philip Willett, of Mountain Lake Park, who has been on the American lecture platform for a number of years, has been invited to address the State Teachers' Association when it assembles at the Park in June next. The subject of Mr. Willett's address will be "The Poetry, Fathos and Humor of Life."

Schools Will Close on April 2.

To the Editor of The Republican:

To relieve the minds of those who have been misled by an article appearing in one of the Oakland papers saying that the schools would close at the end of six months, I desire to say that the school term will be seven and one-half months, closing on April 2nd.

Very respectfully,
E. A. BROWNING,
County Superintendent

GIVE THEM A START

The New Year is rapidly approaching. This would be a good time for you to start your young folks on the road to Success.

Early training in the practice of self-denial; instruction as to the use and value of money; opportunities for earning and saving money; all these tend to fix and fasten the children in the ways of thrift and prosperity.

We most gladly assist the young people in getting started.

DEATH RECORD.

JAMES O. SMITH.

James O. Smith, brother of Miss Jennie Smith, died in a Washington (D. C.) hospital last Thursday of pneumonia after an illness of but five days. His remains were brought to Oakland on train No. 55 Saturday afternoon and interred in the cemetery here beside those of his mother. The body was accompanied to Oakland by Mrs. Smith, his widow, Mr. Daniel Smith, his brother, and Miss Jennie Smith, his sister. The deceased was a familiar figure at Mountain Lake Park for twenty years, removing from that place to Washington several years ago. Besides his widow he leaves three daughters, three, five and seven years of age respectively.

VERA M. FERGUSON.

Vera M., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Ferguson, recently of Mountain Lake Park, but now residents of Fairmont, W. Va., and granddaughter of Mr. Snmuel Ferguson, of Oakland, died at the home of her parents in Fairmont Saturday morning, February 13th, aged fourteen years and one month. The deceased had been an invalid for about seven years, her protracted illness dating from an attack of pneumonia from which she never fully recovered. The remains of the deceased were brought to Oakland on train No. 8 Sunday morning and conveyed to the home of Mr. Samuel Ferguson from whence the funeral took place Sunday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock, the services being conducted by Rev. J. B. Workmad, assisted by Rev. John M. Davis. The interment was made in the Oakland cemetery.

MRS. JESSE REED.

Died, very suddenly at her home in Kendall, Mrs. Jesse Reed, aged about forty years. The deceased lady was the wife of Mr. Jesse Reed, who holds a responsible position with the Penn-Garrett Coal Company. She leaves besides her husband three children. Mrs. Reed's death came as a great shock to her family and friends as a few minutes before her demise she was engaged in her usual household duties, heart disease being the cause of death. Her remains were taken to her former home in Pennsylvania and interred.

Dr Frank Laughlin, of Deer Park, who has been receiving treatment at a private sanitarium near Baltimore for several months past, was taken from the institution last Sunday and brought to his home by his brothers, Messrs. Ad. and Hice Laughlin. The mental as well as the physical condition of the patient is such as to afford no hope for his recovery, although he may continue to live for many years.

The week's engagement of the Champion Stock Company at the Oakland Opera House will close Saturday night. The company is composed of artists of exceptional ability and the plays so far presented have been clean, wholesome and worthy the patronage of the citizens of the town. "Cozy Corners," which was presented Tuesday night, is spoken of as being one of the finest plays ever witnessed in Oakland. This play will be put on at a matinee Saturday afternoon when the price will be 10 cents for grown-ups as well as children. Tonight "In Washington" will be played. Friday night "Kentucky Mountaineer" will be presented and on Saturday night "Lost in the Desert" will be the attraction. The prices for the night performances will be 10, 20 and 30 cents.

Mr. Leo Rasche, a native of Oakland and brother of Mr. H. A. Rasche, B. & O. agent here, has succeeded to the editorship of the Grafton Daily Sentinel, by the retirement of Mr. James W. Holt, who served in the capacity of editor and owner of that paper for the past thirty-seven years. Mr. Rasche received his early newspaper training in THE REPUBLICAN office, leaving its employ several years ago, going from here to Grafton where he "made good." It is rather a peculiar coincidence that of the three newspapers in Grafton all are edited and owned by former Oakland people. The Sentinel being controlled by Mr. Rasche; the Daily Republican is owned and edited by Messrs. G. A. Bolden and D. Grant Smith, both of whom were formerly employed in this office, Mr. Bolden being a native of Oakland, and the Leader, a weekly paper and the Democratic organ of Taylor county, is owned by Mr. James M. Litzinger, who is also its editor. Mr. Litzinger was for many years editor of the Mountain Democrat, having disposed of his property here several years ago to the present proprietor, Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh. Mr. Rasche has the best wishes of a large number of friends in Oakland for success in his new position.

Selling Out to Quit Business.

As I am going to Montana to locate in the spring, (not later than May 1st), am selling out my entire stock at a great reduction. A large line of watches, clocks and all kinds of solid gold and gold filled jewelry, cut glass, bric-a-brac, eye glasses, manicure sets, etc., to be disposed of. Also a good Mosler safe, weight about 5300 pounds, and all of my fixtures.

FRANCIS E. GONDER, Jeweler, Ravenscroft Building. Oakland, Md.

Don't miss the bargains for the remaining days of Sincell's White Sale which will continue until February 27th.

FOR BETTER VENTILATION

School Building, Crowded With Scholars, With Little or No Fresh Air.

To the Editor of The Republican:

My object in writing these lines is to help toward better conditions and enjoyments of school life of the scholars now crowded within the four walls of the public school building in Oakland.

From sources that cannot be successfully contridicted I learn that the ventilation of the various rooms in the building are nil. The same air is breathed time and again by the pupils and no effort has been made by the school authority to correct this evil which eventually will breed diseases, the most insiduous of which is the great white plague—consumption—which, when once planted in the system, becomes slow but sure death.

I know whereof I speak, when I say that the only ventilation afforded the several rooms in the school building is that of lowering the upper sash of the windows in the various rooms which creates a draught over the unprotected heads of the children. These draughts are productive of colds which in some instances drift into pneumonia, incurring death. The untold suffering of the patient as well as those whose heartstrings are interwoven with the sick boy or girl is away beyond computation.

The conditions prevailing in the Oakland school are a disgrace to this twentieth century civilization and should be remedied, no matter what the cost in dollars and cents may be and if the authorities having the educational welfare of the public school children in hand fail to do their duty in this as well as in other respects they should be removed from office and others installed who will do their duty to the rising generation without hesitation.

Maryland is spending hundreds of dollars every year in an effort to stamp out consumption, yet her local officials close their eyes to condltions which will eventually, or may already have, plant the seed of this dread disease in the body of countless numbers of the public school children of Oakland.

A change in the conditions surrounding our school children is demanded and the writer feels that he has not overstepped the bounds of civic duty in making this demand. Will the School Board act now, or will that body procrastinate as usual?

DEATH RECORD.

JAMES O. SMITH.

James O. Smith, brother of Miss Jennie Smith, died in a Washington (D. C.) hospital last Thursday of pneumonia after an illness of but five days. His remains were brought to Oakland on train No. 55 Saturday afternoon and interred in the cemetery here beside those of his mother. The body was accompanied to Oakland by Mrs. Smith, his widow, Mr. Daniel Smith, his brother, and Miss Jennie Smith, his sister. The deceased was a familiar figure at Mountain Lake Park for twenty years, removing from that place to Washington several years ago. Besides his widow he leaves three daughters, three, five and seven years of age respectively.

VERA M. FERGUSON.

Vera M., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Ferguson, recently of Mountain Lake Park, but now residents of Fairmont, W. Va., and granddaughter of Mr. Snmuel Ferguson, of Oakland, died at the home of her parents in Fairmont Saturday morning, February 13th, aged fourteen years and one month. The deceased had been an invalid for about seven years, her protracted illness dating from an attack of pneumonia from which she never fully recovered. The remains of the deceased were brought to Oakland on train No. 8 Sunday morning and conveyed to the home of Mr. Samuel Ferguson from whence the funeral took place Sunday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock, the services being conducted by Rev. J. B. Workmad, assisted by Rev. John M. Davis. The interment was made in the Oakland cemetery.

MRS. JESSE REED.

Died, very suddenly at her home in Kendall, Mrs. Jesse Reed, aged about forty years. The deceased lady was the wife of Mr. Jesse Reed, who holds a responsible position with the Penn-Garrett Coal Company. She leaves besides her husband three children. Mrs. Reed's death came as a great shock to her family and friends as a few minutes before her demise she was engaged in her usual household duties, heart disease being the cause of death. Her remains were taken to her former home in Pennsylvania and interred.

Dr Frank Laughlin, of Deer Park, who has been receiving treatment at a private sanitarium near Baltimore for several months past, was taken from the institution last Sunday and brought to his home by his brothers, Messrs. Ad. and Hice Laughlin. The mental as well as the physical condition of the patient is such as to afford no hope for his recovery, although he may continue to live for many years.

The week's engagement of the Champion Stock Company at the Oakland Opera House will close Saturday night. The company is composed of artists of exceptional ability and the plays so far presented have been clean, wholesome and worthy the patronage of the citizens of the town. "Cozy Corners," which was presented Tuesday night, is spoken of as being one of the finest plays ever witnessed in Oakland. This play will be put on at a matinee Saturday afternoon when the price will be 10 cents for grown-ups as well as children. Tonight "In Washington" will be played. Friday night "Kentucky Mountaineer" will be presented and on Saturday night "Lost in the Desert" will be the attraction. The prices for the night performances will be 10, 20 and 30 cents.

Mr. Leo Rasche, a native of Oakland and brother of Mr. H. A. Rasche, B. & O. agent here, has succeeded to the editorship of the Grafton Daily Sentinel, by the retirement of Mr. James W. Holt, who served in the capacity of editor and owner of that paper for the past thirty-seven years. Mr. Rasche received his early newspaper training in THE REPUBLICAN office, leaving its employ several years ago, going from here to Grafton where he "made good." It is rather a peculiar coincidence that of the three newspapers in Grafton all are edited and owned by former Oakland people. The Sentinel being controlled by Mr. Rasche; the Daily Republican is owned and edited by Messrs. G. A. Bolden and D. Grant Smith, both of whom were formerly employed in this office, Mr. Bolden being a native of Oakland, and the Leader, a weekly paper and the Democratic organ of Taylor county, is owned by Mr. James M. Litzinger, who is also its editor. Mr. Litzinger was for many years editor of the Mountain Democrat, having disposed of his property here several years ago to the present proprietor, Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh. Mr. Rasche has the best wishes of a large number of friends in Oakland for success in his new position.

Selling Out to Quit Business.

As I am going to Montana to locate in the spring, (not later than May 1st), am selling out my entire stock at a great reduction. A large line of watches, clocks and all kinds of solid gold and gold filled jewelry, cut glass, bric-a-brac, eye glasses, manicure sets, etc., to be disposed of. Also a good Mosler safe, weight about 5300 pounds, and all of my fixtures.

FOR BETTER VENTILATION

School Building, Crowded With Scholars, With Little or No Fresh Air.

To the Editor of The Republican:

My object in writing these lines is to help toward better conditions and enjoyments of school life of the scholars now crowded within the four walls of the public school building in Oakland.

From sources that cannot be successfully contridicted I learn that the ventilation of the various rooms in the building are nil. The same air is breathed time and again by the pupils and no effort has been made by the school authority to correct this evil which eventually will breed diseases, the most insiduous of which is the great white plague—consumption—which, when once planted in the system, becomes slow but sure death.

I know whereof I speak, when I say that the only ventilation afforded the several rooms in the school building is that of lowering the upper sash of the windows in the various rooms which creates a draught over the unprotected heads of the children. These draughts are productive of colds which in some instances drift into pneumonia, incurring death. The untold suffering of the patient as well as those whose heartstrings are interwoven with the sick boy or girl is away beyond computation.

The conditions prevailing in the Oakland school are a disgrace to this twentieth century civilization and should be remedied, no matter what the cost in dollars and cents may be and if the authorities having the educational welfare of the public school children in hand fail to do their duty in this as well as in other respects they should be removed from office and others installed who will do their duty to the rising generation without hesitation.

Maryland is spending hundreds of dollars every year in an effort to stamp out consumption, yet her local officials close their eyes to condltions which will eventually, or may already have, plant the seed of this dread disease in the body of countless numbers of the public school children of Oakland.

A change in the conditions surrounding our school children is demanded and the writer feels that he has not overstepped the bounds of civic duty in making this demand. Will the School Board act now, or will that body procrastinate as usual?

SCIENCE AND INVENTION

TRI-FACIAL NEURALGIA.

Cure Effected by Injection of Alcohol Into Nerves.

The new treatment of tri-facial neuralgia, which Charles H. Duncan, M. D., visiting surgeon St. Gregory's hospital, is teaching at the New York Polyclinic Post-Graduate Medical college and hospital, as an assistant of Dr. John A. Bodine, is based on the discovery of Schlosser that alcohol is destructive or deadly to nerve tissue, and the perfecting of a method of injecting alcohol into the branches of the fifth nerve.

Tri-facial neuralgia is not a neuritis, of its etiology little is known, Dr. Duncan explains in the New York World. We do not know what it is. Up to the present time the prognosis has been poor as far as relief or recovery is concerned. Neurologists of the old school have long been accustomed to palliate their cases with morphine and strychnine to the limit of endurance, and then to hand them over to the surgeon for operation on the gesserian ganglion, with its disfigurements, dangers and doubtful efficacy, knowing full well that in many cases regeneration of nerve tissue will occur and the pains return.

Dr. Platt, in discussing Dr. Bodine's paper at the Academy of Medicine, said: "The pains of tri-facial neuralgia are the most frightful of all pains, and the second and third branches of the fifth nerve are the most common divisions affected." He said: "The second and third branches are the most exposed to bacteria, moisture and varying temperature in the mouth and nose, and it may be that this has something to do with the extraordinary sensations. All other sensory nerves are protected. None other is so exposed."

In this new treatment for tri-facial neuralgia the operation performed aims:

First: To inject two cubic centimeters of 75 per cent. alcohol into the third division of the fifth or the superior maxillary nerve as it emerges from the foramen rotundum, but not through the foramen, as alcohol is destructive of brain tissue as well.

Second: The injection of two cubic centimeters of 75 per cent. alcohol into the second division of the fifth or the inferior maxillary nerve as it emerges from the foramen ovale. The needle here comes closer to the brain than in the other injection.

Third: The injection of two cubic centimeters of alcohol into the first or ophthalmic nerve as it emerges from the sphrenoidal fissure. The results of this operation have been so disastrous in its immediate effects that it has not been performed very often; however, there have been no serious final results.

In performing the operation the skin is first injected with a solution of cocaine. After the operation a drop of collodion serves as dressing. The solution used for the first injection is 75 per cent. alcohol; if any subsequent injection is necessary 90 per cent. alcohol is employed.

The pain returns after an injection in about 14 months; this is about time for regeneration of the nerve tissue to take place. The paroxyms of recurrence are never so severe as the paroxyms before an injection.

There is no record of systemic disturbances following the operation, as shock, rise in temperature, headaches, vomiting, etc.

There have been no fatalities, and all have been relieved so far, and the relief has been immediate.

After a few minutes the tormenting pain of years disappears entirely, and the patient walks out of the office smiling.

One patient gained 18 pounds in four months following the operation; all are most grateful.

All who have followed the history of these cases and know how frightfully these patients suffer, and what little relief medicine has offered, will welcome a treatment that promises instant relief, and which is comparatively simple and safe in the hands of an experienced operator.

CONCERNING BANDITS.

The highwayman who robs a stage
In some far western solitude
But perpetrates in cowboy style
An exploit crude.

The cracksman who can drill a safe
With tempered tools to serve his need
Can boast not that he has performed
A daring deed.

The burglar who with nonchalance
Can carry off a red-hot stove
Is not the peer of those who swipe
Their treasure trove.

The robber whom we fear the most,
On whom our eyes with terror look,
Is she who carries off from us
A red-hot cook.

Wouldn't It Be Lovely?

Wouldn't this world be splendid, wouldn't this life be sweet,
If we always could mean the kindly things we say to the ones we meet?
Hate would dwindle and sorrow would suddenly disappear,
If people would cease repeating the scandalous things they hear.

Wouldn't the world be joyful, wouldn't the days be fair
If at home we kept company manners
when company was not there?
Sadness would soon be buried and few men would foolishly fret
If something more than politeness were back of the praise we get.
—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Editor's Sally.

City Editor—What do you mean by saying in this robbery story that "Brown was knocked down and relieved of a hundred pounds?" Were you ever robbed yourself?

New Reporter—No, sir.

City Editor—That accounts for it. If you'd been robbed you wouldn't describe the loss of a hundred quid as a relief!

A Neighborly Inquiry.

Other Fish to Fry.

"Ma'am, here's a man at the door with a parcel for you."

"What is it, Bridget?"

"It's a fish, ma'am, and it's marked C. O. D."

"Then make the man take it straight back to the dealer. I ordered trout."—Baltimore American.

A Zoological Question.

The director of the zoological gardens was on his vacation. He received a note from his chief assistant which closed thusly: "The chimpanzee seems to be pining for a companion. What shall we do until you return?"—New York Herald.

Barber—Close, sir?

Customer—See here; what business is it of yours whether I'm close or not? I'll tell you one thing, young man—I don't tip, if that's what you want to know.

WILL WIN IN TWO YEARS.

National Prohibition Prospects in Sweden Are Encouraging.

The expected enactment of national prohibition in Sweden has been again delayed by the present legislature. Two prohibitory measures—one providing for national prohibition within 20 years, and the other introducing immediate local option—were carried in the lower house of the Swedish parliament, but lost in the upper chamber.

There is good reason for the expectation of temperance reformers that in two years both measures will be pressed through successfully. At that time, under the new election law which gives throughout the nation one vote to each man over 21 years, the character of the upper house will be greatly changed through the lessening of the power of the aristocratic and capitalistic classes in legislative control and temperance reform can no longer be stayed.

The present arrangement is one of property qualification—the number of votes one man controls increasing according to his income. What a deterrent effect this has had on temperance reform in all stages may be gleaned from the cases cited in the temperance press of the country:

In Borgijo, 16 property owners outvoted 123 small holders; in Norrbarke 15 property owners outvoted 174 small holders, and at Atvindaberg 11 votes, including among them those of a brewery interest, outnumbered 133 votes of smaller holdings, where a beer license was the issue.

The great suffrage reform of last year puts an end to such unfairness.

A motion was brought forward by Herr Kvarnzelim and carrried in the second chamber of the Swedish parliament last year, the purpose of which was to put an end completely to the receipt of any moneys from the drink traffic by the Swedish state. This motion was lost in the upper chambers, on the ground that, if the revenue from the drink traffic were cut off, other sources of supply would be taxed, and as representatives of the capitalist and land owning class they preferred that the wage earners should continue to contribute an immense share of the revenue through expenditure on drink.

The temperance needs of the country are pressing, and a strong current of public opinion is urging reform. Without doubt the suffrage readjustment will prove a prologue to the great prohibition movement throughout Sweden, and advance the cause in all northern Europe.

REFORM IN ITALY.

How the Temperance Movement Is Progressing in That Land.

Reports from Rome state that the Young Socialists recently in session in the Italian capital concluded their congress with a significant vote in favor of temperance reform—a subject which has hitherto attracted far less attention in Italy than in England and other European countries. The congress passed a motion in favor of the state monopoly of all alcoholic liquors, and expressed the opinion that the profits derived from their sale should be devoted to a temperance crusade, especially among working men. It also advocated a reduction in the number and hours of public houses and bars, an increase in the octroi duty on alcohol, with a corresponding diminution in those on sugar and coffee, which is at present respectively 50 and 12 per cent., at the gates of Rome; the diffusion of anti-alcoholic teaching in schools and bar racks and the opening of reading rooms and recreation rooms for the working classes, was also recommended. This shows that the awakening against the alcohol evil in Europe is confined neither to a special country nor to any special class, but is rousing the people generally to great and determined effort to free themselves from the drink evil as the greatest national foe.

Temperance Reform in Russia.

The council of ministers in St Petersburg has recently sanctioned the introduction of a bill in the duma amending the regulations for the sales of spirits. It is proposed in this measure to restrict the consumption of spirits by increasing the capacity of the smallest measure that can be sold to one-fortieth of kilderkin (about half a gallon), and by reducing the number of places where spirits can be bought. The inhabitants of villages are further given the right to close existing public houses, to prohibit the opening of new ones, and to limit the hours of sales by resolution of the local council. The bill also prrovides for the prosecution in the criminal courts of habitual drunkards, and imposes penalties for the illicit sale of spirits.

Saloons Kept Out.

Saloons are kept out of the residence districts of San Jose, Cal., by city ordinance, and whenever the power to do this has been questioned, the courts have sustained the rule.

Soldiers Sign Pledge.

The president of the Utah branch of the W. C. T. U., after addressing the soldiers at Fort Douglas on the subject of abstinence, secured the pledge of 23.

OMELET WITH COLD HAM.

Makes One of the Daintiest of All Breakfast Dishes.

An omelet, made with finely chopped cold ham and chopped parsley, forms a dainty breakfast dish. Chop finely some pieces of cold ham and add a teaspoonful of chopped parsley and a seasoning of salt and pepper. Well whisk the whites and yolks of two eggs separately, add the beaten yolks to the chopped ham and just before cooking the omelet, quickly stir in the whites previously beaten to a stiff broth. Put a good sized piece of butter into the omelet pan and when the butter has melted, pour in the omelet. Stir the omelet with a spoon or fork one way till it begins to thicken and when the under part is nicely browned, turn the omelet over in oval-shape and serve immediately.

BREAKFAST OR LUNCH DISH.

Stuffed Kidneys a Welcome Addition to the Menu.

Four or six small kidneys, two tablespoonfuls of butter, two ounces of bread crumbs, one teaspoonful chopped parsley, pepper and salt and a little lemon juice. Skin the kidneys and split them lengthwise, but not quite through. Leave enough to act as a sort of hinge. Rub them inside with melted butter, and broil them over a clear fire for ten minutes.

Have ready the stuffing of crumbs, parsley and butter, well seasoned with salt and pepper. Heat in a small saucepan and add the lemon juice.

Dish the kidneys and put some of this mixture inside each. Fold them over, sprinkle with salt and pepper and serve very hot.

Brown Bread Pudding.

Take about half a loaf of bread and cut into slices, or use left-over pieces; spread each piece with butter and lay in a pan. Pour over this enough cold water to cover well and let soak about five minutes. In the meantime break one egg into your pudding pan and beat it well; add one-half cup brown sugar, one-half corn sirup, one-third teaspoon each of cinnamon, allspice and nutmeg, powdered; then lightly squeeze out the water from the bread by handfuls, crumbling it into the other mixture. Be careful to get all the butter that may come off into the water. Mix well and bake one hour. Sauce: One quart water, butter size of a walnut, half cup vinegar, three-fourths cup sugar; let boil a few minutes and thicken with two tablespoons flour rubbed smooth in a little cold water. Take from stove and add one teaspoonful vanilla.

Ham Fritters.

Heat to boiling point one cupful of stock. Thicken with a tablespoonful each of flour and butter cooked together, and add to it one cupful of cold cooked chopped ham, one egg well beaten, and dry mustard and Worcestershire sauce to season.

Heat thoroughly, take from fire and cool. Make a fritter batter of one cupful of sifted floor, two teaspoonfuls of melted butter, a scant cupful of hot water, the beaten white of an egg, and a pinch of salt. Shape the ham mixture into small balls, dip in fritter batter and fry in deep fat.

Scotch Broth.

Buy two pounds of mutton from the neck and add to it two quarts of water. Let it stand for an hour. Heat slowly and add half a cup of barley, let it boil and skim again, then simmer for an hour. Add to it half a cup of chopped onion, half a cup of chopped carrot, half a cup of chopped turnips and half a cup of celery which have been fried for five minutes in clean drippings. Then let the entire soup simmer for three hours. Season highly, thicken with a little flour and serve with chopped parsley on the top.

Cooking Potatoes.

Place potatoes in a skillet, iron saucepan, or upon an asbestos circle; cover tightly with a turned over saucepan, plate or lid. Set on the back of the stove. When done, the effect will be the same as that of baking. Instead of paring, boiling and mashing potatoes, bake them this way or in an oven, remove from skins, season, and mash, and the flavor is delicious, much better than that of ordinary mashed potatoes, especially if, in removing the skins, care is taken to get all the contents out.

Escalloped Cabbage.

Cut half-boiled cabbage in pieces, put in buttered baking dish, sprinkle with salt and pepper and add one cup white sauce. Lift cabbage with fork that it may be well mixed with sauce, cover with half-cup buttered crumbs, bake until crumbs are brown. White sauce is made of four tablespoons butter, four tablespoons flour, quarter teaspoon salt, little pepper, one cup milk. Melt butter, add flour and seasoning, stir in milk slowly, cook until thick and smooth.

New Dress for Hash.

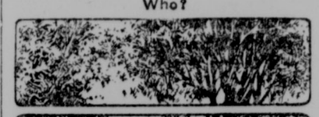
Heat a pint of gravy left from a pot roast to make a real brown gravy, add a cupful each of boiled spinach, chestnuts and French mushrooms, chopped, and a teaspoonful each of currant jelly and sherry, and thin, large slices of cold meat; warm thoroughly and serve with pieces of toast, sliced lemon and watercress.

Meringue Cookies.

Take six to eight small cookies (I use five-o'clock teas). Beat the whites of two eggs, or more according to cookies. Use two teaspoons of sugar, or more to suit the taste. Put some jelly in center of cookie and the egg on top. Brown slightly. Makes a very dainty cookie.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Who?



Oh, who wouldn't go back to the little old town,
To the village of youth and the woods that are brown,
Just to fish for a while where the ripples sing by
Ere the world got its grip on our lives—you and I?
Oh, who wouldn't go back to the old district school
Just to dash from its door to the old swimmin' pool,
Just to dive and to duck and to tie up the shirts
In the shade of the elms where the highflier flirts?

Oh, who wouldn't steal down to the ball ground once more
For a game of "Old Cat" with the fellows of yore,
And to argue again with a cry and a shout
That the umpire is rotten "fer callin' me out?"
Oh, who wouldn't go back to the eyes of a girl
With a pair of red lips and a brown, saucy curl,
There to fight for her love—and to do it some more—
Just to win the affection of one you adore?

Ah, the days of the past! Shall we sing of their grace,
In the streets that are cobbled and noisy of pace?
Shall we say, "Get thee hence, thou art childish and small,
In the days when the Money King trumpets his call?"
Oh, you may if you will, but for me, I prefer
Just a little less gold and a little more myrrh!
You may plunge, you may strain in the heart of the fray—
I am dreaming of myrtle and roses today!

Bashful.

It is reported that one of our well-known young man went out to visit a couple of capricious young ladies the other night, and it seems that they framed it up on him to some extent and planned to have all sorts of sport when he came to spend the evening. As he was accredited with being somewhat bashful they thought it would be a great joke to imitate everything he did. When he appeared in the parlor he blew his nose, and each of the girls promptly followed suit. The incident struck him rather funny at the time, but he didn't make any particular cute remark about it. He said "Nice evening" and sat down and they repeated the performance. The repetition of the remark caught him again, so before he did anything more he rubbed his hands together and stroked his hair, and they did the same. "Not so cold tonight,' he ventured, in order to be sure of his ground and they repeated with a slight change in emphasis, "Not so cold to-night." There was a slight twinkle of mischief in their eyes, and he caught the cue. He straightened his collar and they did the same, and one of them smiled a trifle. He didn't hesitate any longer but deliberately stooped down and turned up his trousers.—Idaho Falls Post.

Stephen the First Christian Martyr

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 21, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 6:8-15; 7:54-8:3. Memory verses 55, 56.

GOLDEN TEXT.—They stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."—Acts 7:59.

TIME.—About A. D. 35, 36. Ramsay and Harnack place it earlier, 32 and 33. According to Prof. Riddle there was an interregnum of the Roman governors about A. D. 36 when Pilate was deposed, which made it easier for the Jewish rulers to put Stephen to death contrary to Roman law.

PLACE.—Jerusalem. The city, the synagogue of the Libertines, the council chamber, and outside of St. Stephen's gate opposite Gethsemane.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

"We now enter upon a new epoch of continuous development which will lead us without pause to Acts 11:26, i. e., from Hebrew disciples at Jerusalem to Greek Christians at Antioch."—Rackam.

There were two classes of Jews at Jerusalem. "The Grecians" (v. 1), R. V., "Grecian Jews." Hellenists, those Jews who had settled in Greek speaking countries, who spoke the common Greek dialect in place of the vernacular Aramaic current in Palestine, and who would be more or less influenced by Greek thought and customs, and broadened to accept of the necessary new development of Christianity. "Against the Hebrews" (v. 1), the Jews of Palestine, who composed by far the larger part of the church of Jerusalem.

Between these two classes there arose a complaint and murmuring because the widows of the foreign Jews did not receive their natural share of the support given to the home Jews. And yet they needed it even more than the widows who were among acquaintances and friends.

The Difficulty Settled by the Organization of Laymen for the Work.—The church elected seven men to attend to this and similar duties, leaving the apostles free to give their whole time to preaching, prayer, and training the disciples.

The qualities required in these officers of the church were (1) of good report, (2) full of the Holy Spirit, (3) of wise judgment, (4) full of faith.

Character Sketch of Stephen.—1, "A young man of such original genius and special grace that there was nothing he might not have attained to had he been allowed to live. His wonderful openness of mind; his perfect freedom from all the prepossessions, prejudices, and superstitions of his day; his courage, his eloquence, his spotless character; with a certain sweet, and at the same time majestic manner, all combined to set Stephen in the very front rank both of service and of risk. He was already all but the foremost man of his day."—Alexander Whyte, Bible Characters.

2. He was a man of power, the power of faith and character aflame with the Holy Spirit.

3. He was full of grace, and of graces, and the beauty of holiness. Grace and power do not always go together. Some things are beautiful, but not strong. Some things are strong and not beautiful. "How seldom is a Boanerges (son of thunder) at the same time a Barnabas (a son of consolation). But the highest characters combine both. 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength . . . and the beauty of the Lord God shall be upon them.'"—Pres. Mark Hopkins, Strength and Beauty.

4. The source of his power was that he was filled with the Holy Spirit (v. 5). Prof. Bruce said of Phillips Brooks: "The man is just a great water-main attached to the everlasting reservoir of God's truth and grace and love, and streams of life, as by a heavenly gravitation, pour through him to refresh weary souls."—Prof. A. V. G. Allen's Life of Phillips Brooks.

5. The fruits of his power were deeds of healing and love, wonderful miracles, "signs," which were God's indorsement of his teachings. It is almost impossible to prove that one's teachings are from God, except by deeds that only God can do—miracles of transformed character, or miracles of healing and help.

Stephen's Argument of Defense Before the Sanhedrim.—Acts 7:1-53.

1. Stephen's address is not a direct but a real answer to the charges against him.

2. His very use of the Scriptures is a proof that he received them and did not blaspheme by repudiating them.

3. He defends what the Christians thought of the temple by the history in the Bible they accepted.

4. He shows that the Jesus he preached was the one foretold by Moses.

5. He shows that they who pretended to uphold the law were themselves breaking it as did their fathers, whom the prophets condemned.

Saul standing by and deeply impressed by the scene, and not long afterward changed into a disciple of Jesus, shows how the blood of martyrs became the seed of the church.

A seemingly ordinary man was converted, opened his heart to receive the Holy Spirit, and became one of the most influential of men. So it may be true of us.

Out of troublous times, difficulties, and persecutions, as from Jacob's pillow of stones, there may arise a pathway to God and heaven, the "clear shining hills of Beulah above the mists of distraction and the thunderbolts of suffering."

Stephen's Christian life was short, but he accomplished more than most men had they lived as long as Methuselah.

The Orton Enigma.

By HOWARD FIELDING.

Copyright, 1908, by American Press Association.

A CERTAIN man of fabulous wealth invites me to his house sometimes when he has just bought a picture or has had one offered to him. His mansion contains treasures inestimable. I always enter it with awe, a large part of which proceeds from the man and not from the treasures.

Upon the occasion of a recent visit at his request he showed me five small landscapes, all by the same hand and clearly the work of a beginner. Sex and race were strongly declared, as they should be in art to insure steadiness of viewpoint. This work was unwaveringly feminine and thoroughbred Celtic.

"The lady seems very young," said I, "and she has the trade to learn. But she has the gift. What's this signature? M. A. Dorman? It's not very legible."

"It's Donovan," said he. "Her name is Marcia Donovan, and she's pretty enough to knock you down. I'll tell you the story of the pictures."

He took an envelope from the drawer of a desk and handed it to me, indicating by a gesture that I was to read the inclosed letter. This was written upon a sheet which I rightly judged to be the flyleaf torn from a book—written with a pencil, apparently by a demented Chinaman. The idea of reading it made me laugh.

"What language is this in?" said I. And at the moment I solved the puzzle of the signature. I hardly know how. It was "Philip Orton."

Phil Orton is a lawyer and strategist, with a high seat in the councils of the elect, but as yet imperfectly known to the public. His relations with my host are extremely close. And, by the way, I dare not speak of my host by his name. Let me call him Mr. H.

Mr. H., then, proceeded to inform me that there was only one person living who could be depended upon to read Phil Orton's script, a young man named David Barrett, formerly in Mr. Orton's employ in a very confidential capacity. Mr. Barrett, I was assured, was one of the few strictly reliable and honest men in the world.

In the course of maneuvers which it is needless to describe Barrett made a sale of some securities for Orton, and he understood that he was entitled to a commission amounting to about $10,000. Orton declined to pay it.

Barrett had moved heaven and earth and a corner of the other place to make this deal, for he saw a fortune in the $10,000. It would give him a chance to buy a partnership in an enterprise that two other young men, friends of his, were launching with excellent prospects.

"THEY WILL COST $10,500," SAID SHE.

A lifetime might not bring Barrett such an opportunity again, and he was furious with Orton for the egregious breach of faith of which he had been guilty. Both the men have a certain Yankee coldness of blood, with a touch of old fashioned courtesy and precision. The interview between them when Barrett made his final demand was a model for temperance of language veiling red hot animosity, for Orton was enraged clear through by the discovery that Barrett had intended to resign his position if he got the $10,000. He did not get it, but he resigned anyhow, "right in the middle of the panic," said my friend, Mr. H., "and without a card in his hand to draw to," for it seems that he had lost a memorandum which was the sole evidence of Orton's agreement with him, and he believed that Orton had stolen it.

Three or four days later when Barrett was downtown about the lunch hour he met one of Orton's clerks, apparently by accident. The fact was, however, that this clerk and several others, including some from Mr. H.'s office, had been hunting Barrett strenuously for three hours, with orders to meet him "accidentally" if possible.

"Of course I don't know what was the row between you and Mr. Orton," said the clerk, "but I'll give you a straight tip. You can get your job back if you work it right. Go and have a talk with Long Bob."

"Long Bob" was Robert Long, a sort of manager for Orton. Barrett declined to go to see him and could not be moved by mysterious hints of benefits that might follow. He disengaged himself from the clerk (who immediately ran hot foot to Orton's office) and went into a restaurant to eat his luncheon. Presently who should stroll in but Long Bob himself, and he took a seat at Barrett's table, with many expressions of friendly regard.

He ordered something to eat, conversing meanwhile upon random topics. But by and by he began to chuckle, apparently at the memory of something amusing.

"I was thinking of Mr. Orton's hand," said he. "His writing certainly is the limit. I got hold of a piece of it this morning that I'll bet even you couldn't read."

And he pulled an envelope out of his pocket.

"Long Bob," said Barrett, "I wasn't born yesterday. You learned that I was here, and you came over to get me to read that thing. I don't know why, and I don't care. I won't read it. Put it away."

"You're a clever fellow," returned Long Bob, "and you're a business man; that's what you are. And I'll make you a business proposition. I'll pay you $50 if you'll read this note for me."

"I won't touch any of Phil Orton's money," said Barrett; "not with a ten foot pole."

He arose from the table, paid his check and walked out of the restaurant straight into the arms of one of Mr. H.'s clerks.

"Oh, hello; hello, Barrett," said the clerk. "Glad to see you. Mr. H. was asking me if I knew your address. Guess he wants to throw something in your way. Better go around."

"It's about a piece of Phil Orton's writing, isn't it?" asked Barrett.

"I don't know what it is," answered the fellow, but his face betrayed him.

"Tell Mr. H., with my compliments," said Barrett, "that I will have nothing to do with Mr. Orton's affairs."

Now, the truth about the piece of writing is that Mr. H. had received it that morning by mail. On the previous afternoon Orton had left the city on one of those sudden and mysterious journeys which cut an important figure in his scheme of operations. While driving to the ferry in a cab he had thought of something which he wished to communicate to Mr. H., and as there was not time to telephone he wrote upon the flyleaf torn from a book and in the semidarkness of the jolting cab. He wrote the address in a sort of half print which he uses for such purposes, so the missive gave no trouble to the postman, but it threw Mr. H. into a cold perspiration.

Of course there are experts in penmanship, and they are very bonest gentlemen, as Mr. H. was careful to admit in touching upon the point with me, but he did not know any of them as he knew David Barrett. The value of the information in the note might be colossal, especially in the hands of enemies, but Barrett could be trusted with it.

When the clerks failed there was nothing to do but go straight at the mark and pay Barrett's figure if it should prove to be within reason. All efforts to get into communication with Orton had failed. Nobody knew where he was. Nobody could make even an intelligent guess at the message.

At Barrett's bachelor quarters Mr. H. was informed that the young man was not at home. Whereupon the sum of $1 changed hands, and Mr. H. was advised to seek the studio of Miss Marcia Donovan. He heeded this advice and found Barrett, who had just finished telling the story to Marcia and was about to be sent out by her upon some errand to a neighboring art store. The two men met therefore, as it were, upon the threshold, and each read the other's eye. Barrett knew that Mr. H. had come to offer him money, probably several hundred dollars, if he would read that letter. Mr. H. knew that Barrett would refuse.

Mr. H. summoned up all his tact and cleverly elicited the information that Barrett was upon an errand for Miss Donovan. Not for the world would Mr. H. interrupt him or delay the service to the lady. If Miss Donovan would kindly permit him to wait he could have the great pleasure of becoming acquainted with her work. He was a humble admirer of the art pictorial and had a trifling collection at his home, to which he made occasional additions.

Meanwhile Marcia was nearly fainting with Mr. H.'s card in her hand. Suppose, oh, just suppose in a wild dream that this man should take an interest in her work!

As Mr. H. had waved business aside and was now scrutinizing a picture with the air of a true connoisseur, there was nothing for Barrett to do but depart upon his mission. Mr. H. turned from the picture to Marcia.

"You know what I want Mr. Barrett to do," he said.

"Yes," she replied, "but he won't do it."

"You can persuade him. Now, look here, my child, you're an artist, a real one, and poor as a church mouse, I suppose. Very well. I propose to buy five pictures from you. My choice, you understand. What will they cost?"

"You mean," gasped Marcia, "if I persuade Mr. Barrett?"

"Yes."

Marcia knew what Barrett would think of this proposition. He would utterly condemn it. She felt as if she were selling him out behind his back. Not for her own sake, not for fame and fortune, would she do this, because she loved him. But how about his own interests? Here was a chance for him to make money, perhaps even to get his $10,000, but she knew him. He was as stiff necked as a bronze statue. Having decided to refuse Mr. H.'s bribe, no sum on earth could buy him. He must be made to see the matter in another light.

"They will cost $10,500," said she.

Mr. H. opened his eyes wide.

"Great goodness!" he cried. "Why are they worth that?"

She laughed nervously.

"They must be," she said. "Nobody will buy them for less."

This novel method of fixing a price appealed to Mr. H.'s sense of humor, and he laughed long and loud.

"Listen," said she, pale to the lips, "the $500 is for me. I must have something to show. The $10,000 is for him, but he must never know where it comes from. You must give me your word that never, under any possible provocation, will you betray this bargain. You will pay me that money—the $500 separate—and you will never by word or deed let Mr. Barrett know."

"All right," said Mr. H. "I will meet your terms."

"And you promise never, never to disclose this secret no matter what happens?"

"My word and honor," he replied.

When Barrett returned, Mr. H. was no longer a financier; he was a gentle patron of the arts.

"Upon my soul," he cried, "Miss Donovan's work amazes me. She is worthy of liberal encouragement. She has a great future." He turned to Marcia, at the same time indicating pictures with a pointing finger. "I think I'll take this one and that one"—

And he proceeded to discuss the canvases with great delicacy and appreciation until Barrett could have clasped him to his bosom. Not a word meanwhile was said of Orton's note, but Barrett's sense of gratitude was working hard within him. The issue could not be in doubt.

"As a personal favor to you, sir," he said when the matter had at last been cleverly introduced, "I will read that note if I can. But it must be distinctly understood that Miss Donovan has nothing to do with this transaction."

"I certainly do," said Marcia.

For the next half hour Mr. H. and Marcia were busy with the pictures, while Barrett wrestled with the Orton enigma, of which he finally presented a written translation to Mr. H., who read as follows:

Dear H.—I am off for Washington, strictly on the quiet. If necessary, communicate with me through Hubbard. Meanwhile I want you to be sure to settle Dave Barrett's claim against me. Don't let him sue. The matter must not be made public. He does not know why, but it must not at this time. I have just been informed that he intends to sue immediately. His claim is $10,000. Make him take less if you can; if not, pay in full. See that his silence is secured, and at once. I'll be back Friday.

PHILIP ORTON.

Mr. H. read this, and his big body shook with internal laughter. It was the sort of joke that he could appreciate. He had agreed to pay the amount of Barrett's claim to Marcia for the privilege of finding out that he would have to pay it over again to Barrett upon Orton's account. He was pledged to Marcia not to tell Barrett, and he was pledged to Barrett not to disclose the contents of the note to Marcia. And in a matter of this kind Mr. H. is a man of his word.

The five pictures were sent to his house, and Marcia had a check for $500, which she displayed to Barrett, and another for $10,000, which she kept to herself. It had been her intention to take this money to Orton and persuade him to make a pretended settlement with Barrett, whereupon the young man could buy his partnership and all would be lovely, with the wedding bells tinkling.

What was her amazement, therefore, when upon Thursday afternoon Barrett appeared in her studio flushed with triumph. The Orton claim had been settled in full. The partnership had been purchased. The shackles of poverty being broken, he hastened to put on those of matrimony. Would Marcia name the day?

In the natural confusion of the interview the facts of the case came out. It was agreed that the $10,000 must be returned to Mr. H. But Mr. H. would not take it. He insisted that it should be regarded as a wedding gift and that his heartiest congratulations and best wishes went with it.

Wretched Pay for Labor.

At a hearing last summer in London on the "sweating" question, evidence was brought forward showing that 56 women who sewed books and eyes on cards earned at an average a little over 75 cents a week. Another woman was instanced who worked from nine one morning until the next morning and earned 16 cents in that time. It would seem better to die.

TANNING HIDES AND SKINS.

How the Work Is Done and Good Tanning Formulas.

The effect of tanning is to make the soluble gluten compounds of which the skin is composed into insoluble leather. If the skin is hard and dry it must be soaked in warm water and worked until soft. The hair or wool can be cleaned of grease and dirt by adding a tablespoonful of soda to three gallons soapsuds and washing repeatedly.

Place the hide upon a round, smooth log and scrape off all fat with a dull knife. Then take the brains of the animal and work them thoroughly into the hide, which will render it pliable. Now cover the skin with powdered alum and a little saltpeter and fold up with the hair out. Leave it for three or four days, then hang up to dry, and as the skin dries work it until dry and soft.

Another formula recommended by Farm and Home is as follows: Dissolve two ounces alum and two ounces salt in one pint boiling water, and when cold put the skin in and leave it for 24 hours, then hang up to dry. This quantity must be varied to suit the size of the skin to be tanned.

When nearly dry stretch the skin out and nail it hair side down. Then rub in a mixture of equal parts alum and saltpeter until the skin will not take any more, and keep on rubbing it periodically for three hours. Take out the nails, fold it up with skin side together and hang it up for two or three days, rubbing fresh salt and alum in every day. Then rub the skin down with pumice stone and comb out the fur. This process is especially suitable for large skins, such as sheep skins.

To take the hair off bury the skin in wet wood ashes or soft soap for two or three days until the hairs start, or it may be soaked in lime-water. Then clean off the hair, wash well and proceed to tan as before.

Following is a tanning liquor for large skins: Mix four ounces pulverized alum, eight ounces salt, one quart new milk and one pint prepared starch with four gallons soft water. Put in the skins and air them often by hanging over a stick laid across the tub, so they will drain back into it. After a few days of this treatment remove the skins and add one-half teacupful sulphuric acid to the liquor, adding very carefully a spoonful at a time and stirring well.

Replace the skins and stir often for an hour, after which take them out, wring and rinse in lukewarm soft water. Hang the skins up in a cool place to dry, and when they begin to turn white work and stretch them until they become dry. Very large and thick hides should be kept in the liquor three or four days.

After skins and hides are dried out the flesh side should be dressed down with pumice stone. This dressing will soften the hide, when it may be trimmed as desired.

A VERY CHEAP GATE.

It Is Made of Sassafras Poles and Barbed Wire.

A light, useful and durable gate can be made of sassafras poles and barbed wire as shown in the cut. Set a strong post four feet in the ground in the middle of the gateway and balance the gate on it. The lower rail, explains Farm and Home, is made of two forked sassafras poles securely nailed together so as to work around the post.

FARM FACTS.

Better baked beans paid for than roast beef on trust.

Where your fight is your heart ought to be. If it is not—give up the fight!

Some of our readers report the worst consequences of a drought—ground frozen before sufficient rain fell to fill wells or springs.

You wouldn't from choice buy water for fuel. That is what you do when you buy coal in a wet time. In some cases there are 200 pounds of water in a ton of wet coal. You make that much in buying dry coal.

It is easier to keep breeding sheep in condition than it is to put them into condition after they have once run down.

Feeding the fodder out in the pasture is a good practice in dry and pleasant weather. It spreads the manure where you want it and saves hauling.

Kerosene and Eggs.

It must be remembered that in the use of kerosene in the poultry house none of the liquid must ever touch eggs intended for hatching. It is death to the embryo within. Even a drop or two will ruin an egg for hatching. When coal oil is used in the henhouse for exterminating lice, first gather all the eggs. If a setting hen and her nest become infested, remove the eggs to a clean nest, paint and burn the inside of the nest box with kerosene and refill with clean nesting material. To remove lice from a setting hen insect powders or dust must be used, but never any oil or grease, as it will get on the eggs and cause them not to hatch.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 17.—The best known street of Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue, is beginning to assume an inaugural holiday appearance. Seats and grandstands have been built in front of the White House where the President, after his inauguration on the fourth of March, the diplomatic corps, and high government officials will sit to observe the grand parade. Thousands of others will here occupy seats on both sides of the Avenue at prices varying probably from one to two dollars. As usual the mile stretch of avenue from the Treasury Department to the Capitol grounds on the south side will be lined with seats or bleachers very much after the manner of those used in baseball, football and other athletic spectacles. Windows all along the Avenue on both sides are rented at exorbitant prices and from these thousands will gaze at the military, political and civic processions as they pass to and from the Capitol on the fourth of March.

As has been already observed President Roosevelt will be seen in the carriage only as it proceeds to the Capitol. He will not return with his successor to the White House but will go direct to the Union Station from the Capitol, and there take a train for his home at Oyster Bay. This is an innovation; but by no means, as the public well knows, unusual for Theodore Roosevelt.

His personal household goods are already in process of shipment to his New York home, and after President-elect Taft shall have taken the oath of office, Theodore Roosevelt will become a private citizen. There is good sense and propriety in his effacing himself and turning his back on the White House and the Capitol, and leaving the glory and the burden, without diversion of his conspicuous presence, entirely to his successor.

Important differences have developed among the members of the Committee on Ways nnd Means that are expected to involve a bitter fight over the tariff bill when it comes up before the House at the special session to be called for the tenth of March. The Republican stand-patters on the committee are in the minority. It appears that Sereno Payne, leader of the House, and John Dalzell, the leading standpatter, are not working harmoniously on the new tariff bill. From latest information regarding the Ways and Means Committee, Dalzell of Pennsylvania, Bonynge of Colorado, Needham of California, Fordney of Michigan and Calderhead of Kansas are still as rigidly standpat as ever, but those in favor of revision downward and of a more liberal policy are Payne of New York, McCall of Massachusetts, Hale of Maine, Boutelle of Illinois and Longworth of Ohio. The two remaining members, Crumpacker of Indiana and Gains of West Virginia, appears to be a doubtful element, but it is thought a majority is in favor of real revision. It is said that some of the differences between the two groups are irreconcilable and they will not be settled except after a long debate and a bitter contest in the House.

The President, as was expected, has vetoed the census bill appointing three thousand clerks without civil service examination. His most remarkable words in the message vetoing the bill were: "I do not believe in the doctrine that to the victor belongs the spoils; but I think even less of the doctrine that the spoils shall be divided without a fight by the professional politicians on both sides; and this would be the result of permitting the bill in its present shape to become a law."

The message was received with the accompaniment of laughter which has been the recent fashion of receiving messages from the President by the House and Senate. It is believed, however, that Congress will not be able to muster the necessary two-thirds vote to override the veto. It is thought probable that the bill will remain on the table, awaiting the action of the special Congress which, although it will be called specifically for the purpose of considering a tariff bill, will nevertheless have plenary authority to enact other legislation. Even if Congress were able to pass the bill over the President's veto by a two-thirds vote, it is doubtful if some members and some Senators would dare to vote in favor of such a measure.

To Be Perfectly Accurate.

The almanac tells us what the weather will be like next year, the government forecaster tells us what it will be like to-morrow, but for perfect accuracy it is necessary to consult the man who tells us what it was like yesterday.

Where Did Hubby Get It?

Why shouldn't a woman take money from her husband's pocket? Quite often she is only working a bad example.—Exchange.

Heard in a Restaurant.

Gerald—"On account of their similarity in dress it's hard to tell a gentleman from a waiter." Geraldine—"But doesn't the waiter usually own his dress suit."—Bohemian.

Appreciation.

If courtesy were expensive more people might be inclined to regard it as a good thing.

Abuse.

Of satires I think as Epictetus did: "If evil be said of thee, and if it be true, correct thyself; if it be a lie, laugh at it." By dint of time and experience I have learned to be a good post-horse; I go through my appointed daily stage, and I care not for the curs who bark at me along the road.—Frederick the Great.

Care Not Necessary.

Scientific knowledge is sometimes negligible. "My boy," said the kindly English rector to the hobbledehoy of a youth who was picking mushrooms in the rectory fields, "beware of picking a toadstool instead of a mushroom; they are easy to confuse." "That be all roight, sur, that be," said the urchin, "us bain't a-goin' to eat 'em ourselves; they're goin' to market to be sold."

Not Impossible.

"I don't know how true it is," said the Irishman, "but they tell me the bearded lady married and left a wife and four children."

FITZWATER'S RESIGNATION FORWARDED TO GOVERNOR

He Will Not Appear on the Orphans' Court Bench Again.

Tuesday of this week at the adjournment of the Orphans' Court, Chief Judge John L. Fitzwater, who was elected two years ago for a term of six years, forwarded his resignation to Governor Crothers to take effect immediately.

The resignation of Judge Fitzwater has been in contemplation for several weeks or since his visit to a New York specialist under whose treatment he hoped for beneficial results for the relief of a cancerous growth on his face which has already made terrifying inroads.

Judge Fitzwater's retirement from the bench is greatly regretted not only by his associates but by large numbers of friends throughout the county.

His successor will be named by Governor Crothers within a short time. Already there is a scramble on among the unterrified Democracy for the place.

BITTINGER.

Most of the manufacturers of maple sugar in this territory have their camps in operation this week and have already made some sugar of a very fine quality.

Charles Ralston, of Keyser, W. Va., spent last Sunday and Monday among his friends in this village.

Amos Reckner, of North Glade, was here last week on business and his old neighbors and friends were glad to see him.

F. M. Bittinger lost a valuable cow one day last week.

The net sales of the local coal operators in this neighborhood has been exceptionally small this winter.

Earl Stark, the youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. John Stark, was suddenly seized by an acute attack of appendicitis one day last week, and Dr. Robison, of Grantsville, was summoned and succeeded in giving the lad relief.

Messrs. Manassa and Lloyd Brenneman have finished their contract of sawing for Cornelius Bowser and have shut down their saw mill for the present.

A. J. Orendort, who is employed on Mason Bros.' lath mill, was slightly injured one day last week by a piece of timber which was thrown out by the revolving lath saw.

A decided thunder storm visited this section last Sunday afternoon, at which time considerable hail fell.

KILLED NEAR BOND

David Johnson Caught by a Log and Fatally Injured.

David Johnson, of near Brookside, where he is the owner of a small farm on which his wife and three children reside, was fatally injured last Thursday afternoon near Bond, where he has been employed during the winter months as a woodsman, and died the same afternoon at 6 o'clock having been brought into Bond from the woods where he was injured.

Mr. Johnson was employed by DuBois & Bond Bros. and at the time of the accident was engaged with other men in loading logs from a skidway onto the log trucks. He had just set the grabs into a log and this was being hoisted to the trucks when another log rolled down upon him from the pile. He was caught by the rolling timber and crushed against a stump, suffering an injury to his hips and abdomen. He was extricated as soon as possible by his fellow workmen and taken to Bond where his death resulted a few hours later as above stated.

On Friday his remains were sent to his home, the funeral occurring Sunday.

ASHER GLADE.

The weather is very warm at this time and we have had a very mild winter so far.

Mr. Wm. M. Fike and four of his family have attacks of the grip at this time.

Mr. John Meyers of Markleysburg, Pa., is now suffering from a paralytic stroke.

Mr. Bert Cum, of Confluence, Pa., buried one of his children near this place one day last week.

Mr. Jefferson Frazee was kicked by a horse a short time ago and it is said that it is doubtful if he recovers.

Mr. William Gutherie, who was 89 years, 10 months and 20 days old, departed this life February 19, 1909. So far as the writer knows the cause of his death was due to old age. Mr. Guthrie died at the home of his son, Eld. Joseph Guthrie. The bereaved ones have the sympathy of all his friends. Interment was made on Feb. 20, in the Danks cemetery near Chidister, W. Va.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

Tuesday morning the regular semi-monthly session of the Orphans' Court convened with all the judges and Register Friend present, when the following business was transacted:

Letters of Administration granted Nellie M. Broadwater and Jacob S. Miller on the personal estate of the late Noah Broadwater of Grantsville; to William Winterberg on the personal estate of his recently deceased wife, Laura E. Winterberg; and to William A. Maffett on the personal estate of the late William A. DeWitt.

THE MARYLAND--WEST VIRGINIA BOUNDARY LINE

West Virginia Engineer Has Filed Final Maps.

The Preston Republican, published at Terra Alta, W. Va., contained the following last Thursday relative to the Maryland—West Virginia boundary line case:

Civil Engineer Julius K. Monroe, of Kingwood, Monday sent to Senator George E. Price, at Charleston, the final maps he has prepared in the case of the State of Maryland against the State of West Virginia in the old dispute over the line between that part of the two states joining Garrett and Preston counties.

The case has been before the United States Supreme Court for fifteen years or more, and according to reports from Baltimore and Annapolis will be pushed to a conclusion this year. It involves a strip of territory thirty-six and one-half miles in length and from three-quarters of a mile to a few feet in width

Senator Price was retained by West Virginia to assist the Attorney General in opposing the claims of Maryland, when the suit was brought. It is understood that Attorney-General William G. Conley and Senator Price have the defense prepared and that it is an exceedingly strong one.

The basis of the contention originated in Revolutionary war time, when a surveyor, William F. Deakins, was sent to run the line between Virginia and Maryland. He plunged into the wilderness, found the point at which he was to start, the famous Fairfax Stone, and turned his face to the north, in which direction he was to mark a line to the Pennsylvania border.

In due time he reported his work as finished, and his line went on the records as the true one between that part of the two states. Settlers were coming in from the East, purchasing and patenting lands, building homes and making clearings to till the soil, and the Deakins line was generally and with confidence accepted by all. But at a much later date suspicion arose that Deakins, honest old surveyor that he was, had erred in his calculations and a few years before the Civil war Maryland and Virginia named a joint Commission to consider the reports to this effect. The Commission obtained from the Federal Government the services of Lieutenant Michler, of the U. S. Army Engineering Corps, and instructed him to "retrace and re-mark" the Deakins line.

Michler sought the starting place, the Fairfax Stone, at the south point of the border between the two States, and set up his transit. As he moved along he found that he could not maintain a course due north and follow the Deakins calls and it became evident to him that the original surveyor had not allowed correctly for magnetic variation.

Lieutenant Michler then reported to the commisssion, and the members for Maryland insisted that he should ignore the Deakins line and make a new one which should be "due north and south." Virginia's members objected, declaring that as a long period of time had elapsed since Deakins had made the authoritive survey, and as a revision at such a late date would unsettle land titles and inconvenience and embarrass many citizens and property owners, it would be wrong and illegal and unprecedented to mark out a new line. But the Marylanders were obstinate, and the Virginians withdrew from the commission. Lieutenant Michler was then employed by Maryland to run a new line. He did so, and the long disputes was formally started.

When West Virginia was admitted into the Union in 1863, this state inherited the bone of contention. As Virginia had done before her, West Virginia rested on the ancient Deakins line, and continues to defend it against Maryland's suit.

Property holders in the disputed strip have been harassed not a little by the aggressor in the quarrel, it is declared. It is said that some of the residents claim they are citizens of Maryland, though the majority accepts the ancient and original line as the true one.

J. S. Lakin owns several tracts of land in the disputed strip. In one instance he pays taxes in both Maryland and in West Virginia, to be on the safe side. Parley DeBerry, who has gone deeply into the question, has found much valuable evidence to help substantiate West Virginia's claims. He also owns lands in the strip.

Engineer Monroe, who has had charge of the West Virginia defense from the engineering side for years has prepared in great detail the maps and charts, etc. and his good work, it is believed here, will, with the other evidence obtained, successfully do away with Maryland's case. It is understood that the Attorney General will ask the Legislature for an appropriation to continue the defense.

Some years ago J. S. Lakin and his wife were driving through the disputed territory when they came to what seemed to be a new road. Mr. Lakin called to one of his lumbermen and asked where the road led.

"That's not a road," the men replied. "That's Maryland's new boundary line."

It was about a mile west of the line Maryland had formerly contended for, and had been surveyed and marked apparently to furnish Maryland with a wide margin of territory upon which to deal in case of compromise. This line has to do with the fountain source of the Potomac river, but it is not believed that it will cut much figure in the legal settlement of the case.

PIEDMONT MAN BLOWN TO PIECES BY DYNAMITE

Mr. J. W. Ott the Victim of a Terrible Accident.

Mr. J. W. Ott, of Piedmont, was killed about noon on Wednesday at Bloomington, the effect of a terrific explosion of dynamite. Mr. Ott was a widower about 56 years of age and had been employed at the stone quarry at Bloomington, but the day he was killed he had not been working but had walked up to Bloomington, and just at noon, had gone to the shanty where the men who work at the quarry were at dinner. Some of these men had placed 125 pounds of dynamite on a wooden box near the stove, which was said to have been damp and placed there to dry out. As the men were engaged in eating they did not notice that the box and the paper on the dynamite had caught fire until it was too late to make an effort to put it out. Realizing their extreme danger, the men rushed out of the shanty calling to Mr. Ott to run, but he remained and, it is said, threw some water on the dynamite when the explosion occurred. He was instantly killed. His body was found lying against a log, his head having been blown to pieces, and one arm a considerable distance from the body. His remains were taken to his home at Piedmont Wednesday night. The explosion was terrific and was distinctly heard many miles away. The residences of Mr. Brydon and Dr. Kemp, of Bloomington, had all of the glass in the windows and doors jarred out, the same occurring to many other homes in the town. In some homes pictures were jarred off the walls, stove pipes knocked down and people thrown to the ground by the explosion.

Mr. Paul Daily, of Piedmont, who is engaged in the insurance business, was walking up the B. & O. R. R. just below the bridge when the explosion took place. Mr. Daily was thrown to the ground and stunned, but received no serious injuries.

Married.

CUPPETT—BROWN—A quiet home wedding took place Wednesday evening at 9 o'clock at the home of Mrs. Sallie Nuzum, on Washington street, when her niece, Miss Anna Louise Brown, was united in marriage to Mr. Albert Victor Cuppett. The residence was very tastfully decorated with cut flowers, and the ceremony was performed by Rev. J. A. McClelland, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, in the presence of a few close friends and immediate relatives of the couple. After the ceremony a sumptuous wedding supper was served. Mr. and Mrs. Cuppett left next morning for Pittsburg on their bridal tour, and on their return will also spend a few days in Wheeling. Both the bride and groom are excellent young people of our city, and we extend our heartiest congratulations and wish them a happy and prosperous married life.—Grafton Leader.

President's Summer Home.

A movement has taken shape at Annapolis to secure for that city or vicinity, if possible, the location of the President's summer residence, which it is proposed by the bill introduced by Representative Dalzell to construct. The original proposition was to erect the building, which will cost $250,000, on the Hudson. An effort will be made to secure its location within a short distance of Annapolis, and it will be urged that Annapolis possesses all the advantages of healthfulness, society and scenery that are claimed for the Hudson section, and has the additional advantage of proximity to Washington. The Annapolis city council and civic organizations will take up the matter.

HELD FOR THEFT OF LANTERN

Charles Warnick Held by Justice West in Default of Bond.

Charles Warnick, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warnick, of near Hitchcock Tunnel, three miles east of Swanton on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, was arrested and brought to Oakland last Saturday by B. & O. detective T. A. Cale, of Cumberland, charged with stealing a red signal lantern from the rear of a train as it was coming up the seventeen-mile grade near Frankville last Thursday night.

The prisoner was taken before Justice of the Peace E. I. West who committed him to the custody of Sheriff Brown until Tuesday afternoon when a preliminary hearing was accorded him, at which time Detective Cale and several railroad men, members of the crew of the train from which the lantern was alleged to have been stolen, appeared as witnesses against Warnick. The prisoner protested his innocence, but he was positively identified by the railroad employes as the man who took the lantern and he was accordingly committed to jail in default of bond for his appearance at the next term of the Circuit Court.

NORTH GLADE.

Many of our farmers have been plowing and improving their farms this nice winter weather.

G. W. Rodeheaver, our efficient teacher, held quite an interesting entertainment on the 22nd inst. A good program was rendered by the school. Appropriate addresses were made by J. A. Baldwin, Judge Fitzwater and G. W. Moon.

Rev. Brumbaugh received a class of fifteen into full membership on the 14th inst. The church and its interests are being carefully looked after.

Rev. Yugle is also quite active in church work. He has been energetic in his efforts to build a new church here

An Epworth League has been organized with the following officers: G. W. Moon, president; H. C. Hersman, Jas. Fitzwater, Mrs. Chas. O'Brien and Miss Loyada Wilt, vice presidents; 'Squire McRobie, secretary, and Miss Della Custer, treasurer. Devotional meetings are held every Sunday evening to which all are cordially invited.

Rev. Brumbaugh will preach for us Sunday morning, and G. H. Rodeheaver is the leader for League services in the evening.

Notice.

The lectures in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Society, Mitchell building, which were discontinued some months ago, will be resumed Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. All are cordially invited.

LITTLE GIRL ATTACKED BY A SAVAGE DOG

Cecelia Hart Badly Bitten on Last Thursday Afternoon.

The fact that Oakland is and has for more than a generation been overrun with worthless canines, was forcibly demonstrated last Thursday afternoon when Cecelia Hart, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John W. Hart, was attacked by a savage dog belonging to John W. Maroney and barely escaped with her life, being seriously bitten and rescued from worse injuries by the timely action of Mrs. Maroney and Mrs. R. B. Ward.

The little girl had gone to the Maroney home on an errand and was standing at the front door when the dog attacked her from behind by sinking its teeth into the calf of her leg and and dragging her to the ground, cutting a gash an inch deep and two or three inches long. While the child was still lying prostrate the animal continued to bite and tear at her clothes, making two additional wounds. Just at this opportune time Mrs. Maroney appeared at the door and drove the dog away, being assisted by Mrs. Ward, who lives opposite and witnessed the attack on the child.

As soon as possible medical assistance was called and the wounds were cauterized, which to a great extent alleviated the sufferings of the little girl. For nearly twenty-four hours after the dog attacked her she bordered on a nervous collapse. At the present time her wounds are healing nicely and it is hoped that no serious consequences will follow.

A day or two following the Maroney dog was killed by its owner.

While the attack on the little Hart girl was made upon the premises of the owner of the dog, a law is on the statute books of the town prohibiting all dogs from running at large upon the streets. Within the space of a block nineteen worthless dogs were counted yesterday afternoon in less than half an hour. There is no telling when another attack will be made upon a child with more serious consequence than those apparent in the Hart case. Council should either repeal the dog law or enforce it.

A Florida Colony.

Robert Felty is at the head of an organization incorporated at Tampa, Florida, to promote a plan of colonization along the shore of Hillsborough bay and along the Seaboard Air Line Railroad. The tract comprises 14,000 acres. It is expected from 300 to 500 families will move there from the North. Connellsville, Pa., will be represented in the colony.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

"You sneak!—you sham gent!" repeated the American, his voice sinking ominously.

Winthrope dropped in an abject heap, as though Blake had struck him with his club.

"No, no!" he protested, shrilly. "I am a real—I am—I'm a not—"

"That's it—you're a not! That's true!" broke in Blake, with sudden grim humor. "You're a nothing. A fellow can't even wipe his shoes on nothing!"

The change to sarcasm came as an immense relief to Winthrope.

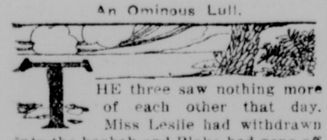
"Ah, I say now, Blake," he drawled, pulling together his assurance the instant the dangerous light left Blake's eyes, "I say, now, do you think it fair to pick on a man who is so much your—er—who is ill and weak?"

"That's it—do the baby act," jeered Blake. "But say, I don't know just how much eavesdropping you did; so there's one thing I'll repeat for the special benefit of your ludship. It'll be good for your delicate health to pay attention. From now on, the cliff top belongs to Miss Leslie. Gents and book agents not allowed. Understand? You don't go up there without her special invite. If you do, I'll twist your damned neck!"

He turned on his heel and left the Englishman cowering.

CHAPTER XIX.

An Ominous Lull.



THE three saw nothing more of each other that day. Miss Leslie had withdrawn into the baobab and Blake had gone off down the cleft for more salt. He did not return until after the others were asleep. Miss Leslie had gone without her supper, or had eaten some of the food stored within the tree.

When, late the next morning, she finally left her seclusion Blake was nowhere in sight. Ignoring Winthrope's attempts to start a conversation, she hurried through her breakfast, and, having gathered a supply of food and water, went to spend the day on the headland.

Evening forced her to return to the cleft. She had emptied the water flask by noon, and was thirsty. Winthrope was dozing beneath his canopy, which Blake had moved some yards down towards the barricade. Blake was cooking supper.

He did not look up, and met her attempt at a pleasant greeting with an inarticulate grunt. When she turned to enter the baobab, she found the opening littered with bamboos and green creepers and pieces of large branches with charred ends. On either side, midway through the entrance, a vertical row of holes had been sunk through the bark of the tree into the soft wood.

"What is this?" she asked. "Are you planning a porch?"

"Maybe," he replied.

"But why should you make the holes so far in? I know so little about these matters, but I should have fancied the holes would come on the front of the tree."

"You'll see in a day or two."

"How did you make the holes? They look black, as though—"

"Burnt 'em, of course—hot stones."

"That was so clever of you!"

He made no response.

Supper was eaten in silence. Even Winthrope's presence would have been a relief to the girl; yet she could not go to waken him, or even suggest that her companion do so. Blake sat throughout the meal sullen and stolid, and carefully avoided meeting her gaze. Before they had finished, twilight had come and gone, and night was upon them. Yet she lingered for a last attempt.

"Good-night, friend!" she whispered.

He sprang up as though she had struck him and blundered away into the darkness.

In the morning it was as before. He had gone off before she wakened. She lingered over breakfast; but he did not appear, and she could not endure Winthrope's suave drawl. She went for another day on the headland.

She returned somewhat earlier than on the previous day. As before, Winthrope was dozing in the shade. But Blake was under the baobab, raking together a heap of rubbish. His hands were scratched and bleeding. To the girl's surprise, he met her with a cheerful grin and a clear, direct glance.

"Look here," he called.

She stepped around the baobab and stood staring. The entrance, from the ground to the height of 12 feet, was walled up with a mass of thorny branches, interwoven with yet thornier creepers.

"How's that for a front door?" he demanded.

"Door?"

"Yes."

"But it's so big. I could never move it."

"A child could. Look." He grasped a projecting handle near the bottom of the thorny mass. The lower half of the door swung up and outward, the upper half in and downward. "See, it's balanced on a crossbar in the middle. Come on in."

She walked after him in under the now horizontal door. He gave the inner end a light upward thrust, and the door swung back in its vertical circle until it again stood upright in the opening. From the inside the girl could see the strong framework to which was lashed the facing of the thorns. It was made of bamboo and strong pieces of branches, bound together with tough creepers.

"Pretty good grating, eh?" remarked Blake. "When those green creepers dry, they'll shrink and hold tight as iron clamps. Even now nothing short of a rhinoceros could walk through when the bars are fast. See here."

He stepped up to the novel door and slid several socketed crossbars until their outer ends were deep in the holes in the tree trunk, three on each side.

"How's that for a set of bolts?" he demanded.

"Wonderful! Really, you are very, very clever! But why should you go to all this trouble, when the barricade—"

"Well, you see, it's best to be on the safe side."

"But it's absurd for you to go to all this needless work. Not that I do not appreciate your kind thought for my safety. Yet look at your hands!"

Blake hastened to put his bleeding hands behind him.

"Go and wash them at once, and I'll put on a dressing."

"No, thank you, Miss Jenny. You needn't bother. They'll do all right."

"You must! It would please me."

"Why, then, of course— But first, I want to make sure you understand fastening the door. Try the bars yourself."

She obeyed, sliding the bars in and out until he nodded his satisfaction.

"Good!" he said. "Now promise me you'll slide 'em fast every night."

"If you ask it. But why?"

"I want to make you perfectly safe."

"Safe? But am I not secure with—"

"Look here, Miss Leslie; I'm not going to say anything about anybody."

"Perhaps you had better say no more, Mr. Blake."

"That's right. But whatever happens, you'll believe I've done my best, won't you?—even if I'm not a— Promise me straight, you'll lock up tight every night."

"Very well, I promise," responded the girl, not a little troubled by the strangeness of his expression.

That night Miss Leslie dutifully fastened herself in with all six bars. She wakened at dawn, and hastened out to prepare Blake's breakfast, but she found herself too late. There were evidences that he had eaten and gone off before dawn. The stretching frame of one of the antelope skins had been moved around by the fire, and on the smooth inner surface of the hide was a laconic note, written with charcoal in a firm, bold hand:

"Exploring inland. Back by night, if can."

She bit her lip in her disappointment, for she had planned to show him how much she appreciated his absurd but well-meant concern for her safety. As it was, he had gone off without a word and left her to the questionable pleasure of a tete-a-tete with Winthrope. Hoping to avoid this, she hurried her preparations for a day on the cliff. But before she could get off, Winthrope sauntered up, hiding his yawns behind a hand which had regained most of its normal plumpness. His eye was at once caught by the charcoal note.

"Ah!" he drawled; "really now, this is too kind of him to give us the pleasure of his absence all day!"

"Ye-es?" murmured Miss Leslie. "Permit me to add that you will also have the pleasure of my absence. I am going now."

Winthrope looked down, and began to speak very rapidly: "Miss Genevieve, I—I wish to apologize. I've thought it over. I've made a mistake—I—I mean, my conduct the other day was vile, utterly vile! Permit me to appeal to your considerateness for a man who has been unfortunate—who, I mean, has been—er—was carried away by his feelings. Your favoring of that bloom—er—that—er—bounder so angered me that I—that I—"

"Mr. Winthrope!" interrupted the girl, "I will have you to understand that you do not advance yourself in my esteem by such references to Mr. Blake."

"Aye! aye, that Blake!" panted Winthrope. "Don't you see? It's 'im, an' that blossom! W'en a man's daffy—w'en 'e's in love!—"

Miss Leslie burst into a nervous laugh; but checked herself on the instant.

"Really, Mr. Winthrope!" she exclaimed, "you must pardon me. I—I never knew that cultured Englishmen ever dropped their h's. As it happens, you know, I never saw one excited before this."

"Ah, yes; to be sure—to be sure!" murmured Winthrope, in an odd tone.

The girl threw out her hand in a little gesture of protest.

"Really, I'm sorry to have hurt—to have been so thoughtless!"

Winthrope stood silent. She spoke again: "I'll do what you ask. I'll make allowances for your—for your feelings towards me and try to forget all you said the other day. Let me begin by asking a favor of you."

"Ah, Miss Genevieve, anything, to be sure, that I may do!"

"It is that I wish your opinion. When Mr. Blake finished that absurd door last evening, he would not tell me why he had built it—only a vague statement about my safety."

"Ah! He did not go into particulars?" drawled Winthrope.

"No, not even a hint; and he looked so—odd."

Winthrope slowly rubbed his soft palms one upon the other.

"Do you—er—really desire to know his—the motive which actuated him?" he murmured.

"I should not have mentioned it to you if I did not," she answered.

"Well—er—" He hesitated and paused for a full minute. "You see, it is a rather difficult undertaking to intimate such a matter to a lady—just the right touch of delicacy, you know. But I will begin by explaining that I have known it since the first—"

"Known what?"

"Of that bound—of—er—Blake's trouble."

"Trouble?"

"Ah! Perhaps I should have said affliction; yes, that is the better word. To own the truth, the fellow has some good qualities. It was no doubt because he realized, when in his better moments—"

"Better moments? Mr. Winthrope, I am not a child. In justice both to myself and to Mr. Blake, I must ask you to speak out plainly."

"My dear Miss Leslie, may I first ask if you have not observed how strangely at times the fellow acts—'looks odd,' as you put it—how he falls into melancholia or senseless rages? I may truthfully state that he has three times threatened my life."

"I—I—thought his anger quite natural, after I had so rudely—and so many people are given to brooding— But if he was violent to you—"

"My dear Miss Genevieve, I hold nothing against the miserable fellow. At such times he is not—er—responsible, you know. Let us give the fellow full credit—that is why he himself built your door."

"Oh, but I can't believe it! I can't believe it!" cried the girl. "It's not possible! He's so strong, so true and manly, so kind, for all his gruffness!"

"Ah, my dear!" soothed Winthrope, "that is the pity of it. But when a man must needs be his worst enemy, when he must needs lead a certain kind of life, he must take the consequences. To put it as delicately as possible, yet explain all, I need only say one word—paranoia."

Miss Leslie gathered up her day's outfit with trembling fingers and went to mount the cliff.

After waiting a few minutes Winthrope walked hurriedly through the cleft and climbed the tree-ladder with an agility that would have amazed his companions. But he did not draw himself up on the cliff. Having satisfied himself that Miss Leslie was well out toward the signal, he returned to the baobab and proceeded to examine Blake's door with minute scrutiny.

That evening, shortly before dark, Blake came in almost exhausted by his journey. Few men could have covered the same ground in twice the time. It had been one continuous round of grass jungle, thorn scrub, rocks and swamp. And for all his pains he brought back with him nothing more than the discouraging information that the back-country was worse than the shore. Yet he betrayed no trace of depression over the bad news, and for all his fatigue maintained a tone of hearty cheerfulness until, having eaten his fill, he suddenly observed Miss Leslie's frigid politeness.

"What's up now?" he demanded. "You're not mad 'cause I hiked off this morning without notice?"

"No, of course, not, Mr. Blake. Nothing of the kind. But I—"

"Well, what?" he broke in, as she hesitated. "I can't, for the world, think of anything else I've done—"

"You've done! Perhaps I might suggest that it is a question of what you haven't done." The girl was trembling on the verge of hysterics. "Yes, what you've not done! All these weeks, and not a single attempt to get us away from here, except that miserable signal; and I as good as put that up! You call yourself a man! But I—I—" She stopped short, white with a sudden overpowering fear.

Winthrope looked from her to Blake with a sidelong glance, his lips drawn up in an odd twist.

There followed several moments of tense silence; then Blake mumbled apologetically: "Well, I suppose I might have done more. I was so dead anxious to make sure of food and shelter. But this trip to-day—"

Satisfied Himself That Miss Leslie Was Well Out Toward the Signal.

"Mr.—Mr. Blake, pray do not get excited— I—I mean, please excuse me. I'm—"

"You're coming down sick!" he said.

"No, no! I have no fever."

"Then it's the sun. Yet you ought to keep up there where the air is freshest. I'll make you a shade."

She protested, and withdrew, somewhat hurriedly, to her tree.

In the morning Blake was gone again; but instead of a note, beside the fire stood the smaller antelope skin converted into a great bamboo-ribbed sunshade.

She spent the day as usual on the headland. There was no wind, and the sun was scorching hot. But with her big sunshade to protect her from the direct rays, the heat was at least endurable. She even found energy to work at a basket which she was attempting to weave out of long, coarse grass; yet there were frequent intervals when her hands sank idle in her lap, and she gazed away over the shimmering glassy expanse of the ocean.

In the afternoon the heat became oppressively sultry, and a long slow swell began to roll shoreward from beyond the distant horizon, showing no trace of white along its oily crests until they broke over the coral reefs. There was not a breath of air stirring, and for a time the reefs so checked the rollers that they lacked force to drive on in and break upon the beach.

Steadily, however, the swell grew heavier, though not so much as a cat's-paw ruffled the dead surfaces of the watery hillocks. By sunset they were rolling high over both lines of reefs and racing shoreward to break upon the beach and the cliff foot in furious surf. The still air reverberated with the booming of the breakers. Yet the girl, inland bred and unversed in weather lore, sat heedless and indifferent, her eyes fixed upon the horizon in a vacant stare.

Her reverie was at last disturbed by the peculiar behavior of the seafowl. Those in the air circled around in a manner strange to her, while their mates on the ledges waddled restlessly about over and between their nests. There was a shriller note than usual in their discordant clamor.

Yet even when she gave heed to the birds, the girl failed to realize their alarm or to sense the impending danger. It was only that a feeling of disquiet had broken the spell of her reverie; it did not obtrude upon the field of her conscious thought. She sighed and rose to return to the cleft, idly wondering that the air should seem more sultry than at mid-day. The peculiar appearance of the sun and the western sky meant nothing more to her than an odd effect of color and light. She smilingly compared it with an attempt at a sunset painted by an artist friend of the impressionist school.

Neither Winthrope nor Blake was in sight when she reached the baobab, and neither appeared, though she delayed supper until dark. It was quite possible that they had eaten before her return and had gone off again, the Englishman to doze and Blake on an evening hunt.

At last, tired of waiting, she covered the fire and retired into her tree-cave. The air in the cleft was still more stifling than on the headland. She paused, with her hand upraised to close the swinging door. She had propped it open when she came out in the morning. After a moment's hesitation, she went on across the hollow, leaving the door wide open.

"I will rest a little, and close it later," she sighed. She was feeling weary and depressed.

An hour passed. An ominous stillness lay upon the cleft. Even the cicadas had hushed their shrill note. The only sound was a muffled reverberating echo of the surf roaring upon the seashore. Beneath the giant spread of the baobab all was blackness.

Something moved in a bush a little way down the cleft. A crouching figure appeared, dimly outlined in the starlight. The figure crept stealthily across into the denser night of the baobab. The darkness closed about it like a shroud.

A blinding flash of light pierced the blackness. The figure halted and crouched lower, though the flash had gone again in a fraction of a second. A dull rumbling mingled with the ceaseless boom of the surf.

A second flash lighted the cleft with its dazzling coruscation. This time the creeping figure did not halt.

Again and again the forked lightning streaked across the sky, every stroke more vivid than the one before. The rumble of the distant thunder deepened to a heavy rolling which dominated the dull roar of the breakers. The storm was coming with the on-rush of a tornado. Yet the leaves hung motionless in the still air, and there was no sound other than the thunder and the booming of the surf.

The lightning flared, one stroke upon the other, with a brilliancy that lit up the cave's interior brighter than at mid-day.

In the white glare the girl saw Winthrope, crouched beneath her upswung door; and his face was as the face of a beast.

Source of Poison Dangers.

The action of foods and liquors on their receptacles may produce deadly poisons. Acid fruits cooked in copper or zinc pots are a particular source of danger. A man who was taken ill in the hunting field with symptoms of mineral poisoning learned that the fine old brandy he carried in his hack pocket had dissolved some of the copper in the sterling silver flasks.

The Ruler of the World.

When we get behind all the circumstances of our daily life we find the thinker, the man with ideas. He is the true ruler of the world. He gives us all things, from the clothes of our bodies to the clothes of our minds. He gives us coats and commandments; mutton chops and morals. He gives us our policies, our religion, all, in short, that we have.—London Daily Dispatch.

Native Education at the Cape.

Generally speaking, the natives are keen about education, though, like many Europeans, they do not much like paying for it. In England the desire for knowledge is so widespread that the percentage of children attending school compares very favorably with that of the most civilized European countries.—Kimberley Diamond Fields Advertiser.

The Mistral.

The mistral is a cold northwest wind which does much damage at certain seasons in France and Italy. From the close of autumn to the beginning of spring, it is especially violent. It dries up the soil and causes dangerous storms on the Mediterranean sea.

The Dublin Cab Driver.

In few cities in the world is your Jehu more rich in fancy than in Dublin, more skilled in embroidered words, better able to sting and wither with the cunning of his quick scorn. It is a feast of that "impassioned logic which outruns the hearer in its fiery course."—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

Reducing Weight.

Racehorse Owner—"William, you are too heavy. Can't you take something off?" Jockey—"I'm wearing my lightest suit, and haven't tasted food all day." Owner—"Then, for goodness' sake, go and get shaved."—Tit-Bits.

Mitigating Circumstances.

A Philadelphia man has just been arrested for flirting with his own wife. It is only fair to the defendant to explain that the lady was heavily veiled and he doubtless supposed she was somebody else's wife.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Perfectly Safe.

When a woman is first married, she fears her husband is so brave and generous that he will get hurt some day rushing into a dangerous place to do a noble act, but she is not long in finding out that on that score he is perfectly safe.—Atchison Globe.

The Tasks for Young Men.

Tasks for rapid and wholesale adjustment fall into the hands of very young men. At the outbreak of the French revolution the 11 men who were destined to become its leaders averaged 34 years of age.—E. A. Ross, in "Social Psychology."

To Preserve Historic Battle-Ship.

Nelson's flagship Victory, almost the last relic of the great naval wars, is to be rerigged, repainted and as nearly as possible restored to the condition in which she gloriously led the port column of the British fleet into battle at Trafalgar.

Earth Mulch.

Many farmers do not know that a spade full of fresh earth put about trees, bushes or vines will protect them from mice. Clear away the grass and leaves and a minute's work will suffice to protect the tree.

Of Calumny.

A nickname a man may chance to wear out; but a system of calumny pursued by a faction, may descend even to posterity.—Isaac Disraeli.

The Gospel in Samaria

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 28, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 8:14-25. Memory verses 14, 15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing the miracles which he did.—Acts 8:6.

TIME.—36 or 37 A. D. Immediately after the martyrdom of Stephen (our lesson). The church has been in existence about six years, with rapid growth and varied experiences.

PLACE.—Jerusalem, and some chief city of Samaria, either Samaria or Sychar.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

1. "There was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem." Not by the heathen, but by the Jews whose authority was being threatened, and whose teaching was in some respects antagonized.

The martyrdom of Stephen was the beginning of the first general persecution of Christians. The circumstances described in our last lesson, growing out of the unsettled state of the Roman government, the accusations against Pilate, and his summons to Rome for trial, followed soon by the death of Emperor Tiberius, gave an opportunity for the Jewish leaders to carry on their persecutions.

V. 2. "Saul . . . made havoc of the church," R. V., "laid waste." As an army devastates the country it overruns, or as wild beasts ravage a garden, or field of grain, or a pasture when they destroy the sheep. Paul's own statement confirms this description.

4. "They were scattered abroad." As seed scattered in all directions by the farmer sowing his field broadcast. They went through Samaria, Galilee, and as far as Phoenicia, Antioch and Cyprus, "Preaching the word." Every seed had life in it and took root and made a new plant, wherever the winds of persecution blew it. These scattered Christians were like brands of fire, kindling a new fire wherever the storm carried them.

Philip here is not the apostle Philip, but Philip the deacon (Acts 6:5) and evangelist (Acts 21:8). He preached in Samaria, met Simon Magus, brought the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ, went on evangelizing the country till he reached Cesarea, where he eventually took up his abode. Here he had four virgin daughters who prophesied and entertained Paul on one of his journeys to Jerusalem.

He was, if not a Grecian Jew, at least of conspicuous liberal sympathies, as his work among the Samaritans shows.

He was "a born preacher," made mighty by being filled with the Holy Spirit, and trained under the apostles. The Sunday school teacher can made an ideal teacher in the same way. "I have often wished," exclaimed Alexander Whyte, the wonderful pastor and teacher of Free St. George's church of Edinboro, "that I could have been one of the two Emmaus men whose hearts burned within them as their risen Lord expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." So does the teacher wish, and he may have his wish fulfilled.

V. 14. "The apostles . . . sent unto them Peter and John." Not as rulers, but as a friendly delegation of leading apostles who could be trusted. They sent their best men on the mission.

Vs. 15, 17. "Prayed for them . . . laid . . . their hands on them." The best spiritual gifts come through prayer. The laying on of hands was the connecting link between the giver and the receiver. "And they received the Holy Ghost," with the same outward manifestations of tongues of flame and speaking with tongues, as well as the inward grace and power, which characterized Pentecost six years before, as appears from Simon's request.

The special reasons for this gift were much the same as on its first bestowal at Pentecost. (1) It expressed clearly the inward grace and power, so that those who received it, and all others, might realize the fact of the unseen gift, as the spark or the lightning reveals the presence of electricity. (2) The new church, under new circumstances, needed the power, and gifts, and fresh life bestowed. (3) It proved to the Jewish disciples, and especially to the church at Jerusalem, that the Samaritan movement was from God, and approved by the Saviour and Master.

V. 18. "Simon . . . offered them money" to purchase from the apostles the power they themselves possessed.

Note 1. From this action of Simon his name has won immoriality of infamy, since the crime of Simony is named after him.

Note 2. The best gifts cannot be bought with money—wisdom, love, peace, new hearts, character, spiritual power. The best things of God are free to all men, like air and sunshine and water, as the most beautiful forms and lines are the most common.

We can treat every one as Christians should treat them.

"There are some persons who think we ought to send missionaries to argue down the infidels. What did Philip do? He preached Christ. Philip did not argue down Simon, he superseded him. The daylight does not argue with the artificial light. The sun just shines! Men sneakingly put the gas out. Let your light so shine.' Life is the unanswerable logic. Holiness is the invincible argument. Charity, love, benevolence, chivalry, self-sacrifice—these form the shining host that will chase all competitors away."—Joseph Parker.

America's "Royal Family."

When the name of William Howard Taft was first seriously considered as a White House possibility speculation became rife as to what manner of woman was his wife, and whether or not she would as gracefully preside at the White House functions as did the one woman whose name will ever be a byword when "The First Lady in the Land" is discussed—Mrs. Grover Cleveland.

While the members of the Taft household are not as numerous as the Roosevelt clan, nor quite as spectacular or picturesque, nevertheless the family is an interesting one, and before the regime of the Tafts will have expired they, too, will have a debutante daughter to present to Washington society. Helen, their daughter, has three more years at Bryn Mawr, and upon graduation will be formerly presented to society. Robert, the oldest son, is now at Yale, while Charlie, "The Kid," is at a preparatory school getting what his rotund father characterizes as "his bumps." Charlie is quite a character, as unique and interesting in a way as the little Roosevelts, although so far his escapades have not been given the prominence in the newspapers as those of Quentin, Archie and Kermit Roosevelt. But, then, it must be remembered Charlie heretofore has been but the son of a cabinet officer, and when his father becomes president it is safe to assert that the many busy correspondents at Washington will find ample scope for their imaginations in making "The Kid" the hero of their narratives.

The Taft family is an interesting one from its head to the youngest boy, and with a woman of so many accomplishments to preside over the White House, it is safe to assert that the Taft regime will in nowise suffer by comparison, for Mrs. Taft was born to rule, and rule she will. Many of the little problems that have proved so perplexing to her predecessors will be quickly and happily solved by her, for no one woman, from her earliest girlhood, has been better trained for the exalted position she is about to assume than Mrs. Tatt, for years one of Cincinnati's reigning belles.

The White House has had two mistresses since the Clevelands took their departure for the more secluded and exclusive life of Princeton, leaving behind them memories of a regime where Mrs. Cleveland was concerned as tender and hallowed at those surrounding the peerless Dolly Madison.

Mrs. William McKinley was Mrs. Cleveland's immediate successor, but the delicate state of her health compelled her to keep well in the background, and the more arduous duties confronting the nation's hostess fell to the lot of others, the wives of cabinet ministers or other women of the official family delegated by Mrs. McKinley to represent her at the hundred and one public functions that are annual fixtures at the White House. Then came Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, and whereas she is known far and near as a charming hostess, yet it is a well known fact that Mrs. Roosevelt is far happier when surrounded only by members of her immediate family than when presiding at state functions where officialdom is her guest.

Mrs. Roosevelt has tact—abundance, in fact—and she is a keen observer too. This was clearly demonstrated by the wholesale sweep she made when she entered the White House as its mistress. Mrs. Roosevelt has as little regard for precedent as her husband, and this is proved by the rattling of dry bones and snapping of red tape that followed the general house cleaning when she became the nation's "first lady." New York may thank Mrs. Roosevelt for its present police commissioner, for Maj. Bingham had ruled the White House with unbroken sway for many years prior to the advent of the Roosevelts. His word was law, even to the choosing of the floral decorations to grace the table at luncheon and dinner when the official family were to entertain.

Mrs. Roosevelt's first act was to select as her social aid-de-camp Miss Belle Hagner, a young woman of rare charm of manner, tact, beauty and birth, all of which admirably fitted her for the post to which she was appointed. As a result of a clash between Miss Hagner and Maj. Bingham, the latter received his conge and orders issued from the war department deposed him as major-domo of the White House, and he once more resumed his duties afield.

A change quite as radical as that between the McKinley and Roosevelt regimes is looked for ward to when Mrs. Taft usurps Mrs. Roosevelt's place. Events of the past few weeks have clearly demonstrated that Mrs. Taft is not only a woman of grace and charm, but one of brains as well. Long identified with official Washington she has had ample opportunity to study conditions there existing, and what woman who has ever been an integral part of official Washington has not indulged in that dream: "If I were the first lady of the land!" This Mrs. Taft will be in every essential. She has made a splendid start by allying herself with that great organization, the National Civic federation, and, taking a commanding lead in that body, she has endeared herself to that class of women who are sometimes slightingly referred to as strongminded. The mother of two sturdy sons and a daughter, the latter now a freshman at Bryn Mawr college, she must appeal strongly to the mother type, for those who know her best will readily testify that she is the best chum her boys and girl ever had, and this she will continue to be in spite of the manifold calls upon her time in the course of her reign in the White House. In a recent speech made in New York at a Civic federation meeting Mrs. Taft plainly showed that she has brains and uses them without in any sense being aggressive or pedantic. A glance at her was sufficient to win to her side the hundreds of women who attended that meeting with the avowed purpose of dissecting their guest of honor to the minutest detail. Her personalty and general appearance won them instantly to her side, even before she took the floor to make her maiden speech in public.

Mrs. Taft talks well and looks well when she is talking. Her smile has the charm of intelligence, that quick flash of recognition, distinct from the stereotyped smile peculiar to women in official life on whom social duties make many demands, even to that of continuously "looking pleasant." She has a generous mouth and handsome teeth, a straight nose, well proportioned to her other features, a broad forehead, above which her brown hair is arranged in a soft pompadour. Mrs. Taft is a book lover and has been a student all her life simply because in the home in which she was reared the books came down from their shelves and made the worlds, they contained part of the domestic environment. Music, perhaps, is her favorite art, and while she does not regard herself as sufficiently in practice to perform for a critical audience she has by no means lost her skill and frequently plays for her children and husband during their evenings at home, and these are far more frequent than one might at first suppose. Mrs. Taft was one of the original founders and patronesses of Cincinnati's famous musical organization, the Symphony orchestra. Other avenues through which her artistic tastes are directed are her love of pictures and her appreciation of wood carving. Charles P. Taft's world-renowned art collection has no more appreciative admirer than his sister-in-law, the wife of the president-elect, and there are many canvasses hanging on the walls of this gallery of her selection.

Mrs. Taft has one adyantage over her predecessors, her knowledge of languages, and what accomplishment is more essential to a woman occupying so exalted a position as that to which Mrs. Taft will succeed in a city where as many languages are spoken as were at the Tower of Babel? Mrs. Taft is, perhaps, one of the best informed women in America, and when asked how it is possible for one with so many demands upon her time to keep up so thoroughly with the events of the world she, unhesitatingly replied: "By reading the daily papers."

This she does assidiously and intelligently, and when the papers that are brought to her boudoir each morning are cast aside Mrs. Taft has absorbed all that is interesting, instructive and healthy contained in their pages.

As a man is judged by the company he keeps, so may one's estimate of a woman be formed by the style of woman she selects as her closest friend. Mrs. Taft's friends in Washington are reckoned by the hundreds, but her intimates are few. Of these Miss Cannon, the daughter of the speaker of the house of representatives, may be mentioned first. Both are devotees of bridge and each takes the game seriously, having mastered all of its many intricacies. Mrs. Taft and Miss Cannon are frequently seen in public together. They drive frequently, this being one of Mrs. Taft's chief diversons, and then, too. they are invariably seen together at the many concerts given in Washington thoughout the official season.

Another of Mrs. Taft's intimates is Hallie Erminie Rives Wheeler, wife of the secretary of the American embassy at Tokyo. Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler recently spent several months in this country, a part of which time they were the guests of the Tafts. Their friendship goes back to long days of travel in the far east, when they saw for the first time many strange things together, thereby discovering a sympathy in the point of view. Gen. and Mrs. Corbin and Gen. and Mrs. Edwards will be prominent figures in the White House social set during the Taft regime. There, too, will be found the Longworths. The latter will conserve the relations between the past and present White House occupants and this may be strengthened should Ethel, the debutante daughter of the Roosevelts, be taken under the wing of Mrs. Taft and chaperoned in Washington, should Mrs. Roosevelt decide to reside at her New York home in the course of her husband's invasion of the African jungles.

The Longworths are quite as firmly intrenched in Cincinnati's most exclusive circles as the Tafts, therefore it is but natural to suppose that the president president's son-in-law and his wife will continue to be conspicuous figures in Washington society.

The army set will have it innings with the advent of the Tafts for aside from the Corbins and Edwardses, previously mentioned, Gen. Bell, as well as Gen. Garlington and Mrs. Garlington, are among the closest of the Tafts' friends. When Mrs. Taft democratically walked forth from her home in Lafayette square the morning of that bright June day on which her husband was nominated for the office he is about to assume, it was to the war department that she directed her steps, and entering the office of the secretary of war, her little son Charlie at her side, she was there greeted by Mrs. Garlington and her attractive daughter, Sallie, who had been invited to share the good news with the candidate's wife.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1909.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Thoughtless and unappreciative as we Americans sometimes are justly accused of being, the great mass of our people do not abate their reverence for the fathers of the republic or their gratitude to them for their heroic services. It is as true today as when it was said originally that George Washington is first in the hearts of his countrymen. There is just as keen an interest in the study of his life and deeds now as there was a generation or so ago when it was possible to hear from the lips of living men who had known and seen him the story of his life and deeds.

Not all the mighty leaders of the people who have taken a large part in the progress of the United States since Washington passed away in 1799 have overshadowed this majestic figure of the revolution and first president of a free people. The things he did in war and the policies he advocated in peace during the formative period of the nation are still the standards by which other men, facing new and possibly just as stern problems, adjust their conduct and their course. Statesmen still draw inspiration from his example and pattern their performance upon the precedents he established. Authors, students and romancers still search with zest for every scrap of writing or record that will add to the fund of information concerning his career, motives and principles. The literature of each succeeding year is enriched with some new contribution upon which to base judgment of his character and his labors, yet nothing that is found or written detracts from the luster of his imperishable fame or takes one cubit from his noble stature.

Thus Washington, in a peculiar sense, is the rich heritage of the passing generations of men in the United States. Probably no native-born American who ever studied anything—at least none who has fortified his mind by reading—has failed, at some time or other, to sit at the feet of Washington and learn something of his great gifts and splendid deeds. And so it is was that Monday, from ocean to ocean, the nation paid tribute to his undying memory, and throughout the length and breadth of the land the youth were told once more of what he was and what he accomplished in the long ago.

COLORED MAN'S TRIBUTE.

Among the many eloquent tributes to Mr. Lincoln upon the centennial anniversary of his birth, few equal and none surpass that of Booker T. Washington. It is worthy of preservation with the other best Lincoln literature of the country.

That a colored man, a former slave, of Mr. Washington's achievements, should be asked to address an audience of white men on the occasion of the banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria was appropriate and that he performed the task so admirably is very wonderful as well as gratifying. Among other things Mr. Washington said:

"You ask that which he found a piece of propetry and turned into a free American citizen to speak to you tonight on Abraham Lincoln. I am not fitted by ancestry or training to be your teacher tonight, for, as I have stated, I was born a slave.

"My first knowledge of Abraham Lincoln came when I awakened early one morning before the dawn of day, as I lay wrapped in a bundle of rags on the dirt floor of our slave cabin by the prayer of my mother just before leaving for her day's work. She was kneeling over my body earnestly praying that Abraham Lincoln might succeed, and that one day she and her boy might be free. You give me the opportunity here this evening to celebrate with you and the nation the answer to that prayer."

After dwelling at length upon the many advantages of human liberty the speaker concluded as follows.

"As we gather here, brothers all, in common joy and thanksgiving for the life of Lincoln, may I not ask that you, the worthy representatives of seventy millions of white Americans join heart and hand with the ten millions of black Americans—these ten millions who speak your tongue, profess your religion—who have never lifted their voice or hands except in defense of their country's flag—and swear eternal fealty to the memory and the traditions of the sainted Lincoln. I repeat, may we not join with your race, and let all of us here highly resolve that justice, good will and peace shall be the motto of our lives. If this be true, in the highest sense, Lincoln shall not have lived and died in vain.

"And, finally, gathering inspiration and encouragement from this hour and Lincoln's life, I pledge to you and to the nation that my race, in so far as I can speak for it, which in the past, whether in ignorance or intelligence, whether in slavery or in freedom, has always been true to the stars and stripes and to the highest and best interests of this country, will strive to deport itself that it shall reflect nothing but the highest credit upon the whole people in the North and in the South.

A Tribute of Love to the Memory of Vera Marie Ferguson.

As a bright and beautiful little flower springs up, so a beautiful little child was born into this world Jan. 21th, 1895. And as a clinging flower she quickly entwined the sacred tendrils of her loving nature about our hearts and lives and held us enthralled.

For seven years she grew in beauty of form and face, and O, that face! 'Twas a joy to look upon it. The light of Heaven shone from those deep blue eyes, the windows of that pure soul, and those golden curls brought sunshine into our hearts and homes, even upon the gloomiest days in winter. But, alas, for our joy and hopes, for, on Jan. 7th, 1902, a great sorrow like a black, chilling cloud dimmed the bright horizon of our earthly hopes for our Vera had been stricken. The best medical skill could only alleviate, after seven heart breaking operations by the most skilled surgeons, the businesslike, but kind-hearted, chief surgeon said, "God only can heal Vera." We then, with renewed fervor, sought the aid of the "Great Physician," and for seven more years the Hand of Death was stayed. It is of these last seven years of this Christ-like life that we especially wish to speak, for as the Immaculate Son of God was made perfect through suffering (Hebrew 5, 8) so this great loving soul began to expand beneath the chastening and therefore loving hand of God. And as the great growth of spirit and soul proceeded, the little flower-like body drooped and drooped, bending gently but surely each day and each year, and the Christ-like love and pathos in those dear eyes became more and more evident. At her own request she was led to the altar of repentance and was immediately accepted of Christ. Through her desire her "Dear Mama" sought and got nearer to Christ, and at her pleading her papa sought and found acceptance of Him who died for for us, and many loving friends were likewise drawn to Him, and many comparative strangers have been led nearer to God by a word or an occasional look into that spiritual face that always had upon it the Light of Heaven.

In her anxiety to help mamma and papa—for the expense of her affliction made hard upon them, financially, at times—she took up the burden, kept the family accounts, planned the dinners, selected the family apparel and as a proof of her divine inspiration she was successful in her management. When the funds ran low, Vera prayed and received more. When employment failed Vera prayed and prosperity returned to the household. If mamma, papa or sister was sick, Vera prayed and health returned. Her friends are numbered by the score. And to illustrate the breadth of her love and faith I will state that her intimate friends consisted promiscuously of those of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faith and descent. And as we sit here near to where that pure soul took its flight and read the shower of letters of loving sympathy that still keeps pouring in from her sorrowing friends, we are filled with wonder while our eyes overflow with tears at the deep pathos and grief expressed. These letters are not all from children, but some come from men of letters and women of great culture. A literary man sends a poem; a prominent minister writes of her inspiration to him and of her unfailing politeness. I will just now state that she thanked her papa with her last breath when he wet her lips with the water she requested. She thanked her doctor when he raised her little form that she might breathe her last breath, and with a weak, trembling and dying hand she hastily brushed away the damp dews of death from that noble brow, thus hoping to spare dear mama and papa a little longer the grief she knew would break their hearts. Just before going she expressed the first and only anxiety, 'twas this "I fear my work was not quite done." But thank God her work goes on in our hearts and lives and the hearts and lives of all her loved friends, and to these loved friends let me say, let us continue Vera's work by being kinder and more patient when we suffer and when the way looks dark.

How inadequate are words in portraying such a life and death. What infinite loss is such a death to this deformed and benighted old world. Well might nature itself weep at such a loss. And as we remember when the little body gently sank into the "silent tomb" the rain came down as though the very clouds were weeping and well they might for Heaven had gained and earth had lost another angel!

A LOVING FRIEND.

HOME WELCOME FOR RETURNING BATTLE FLEET

Sixteen Giant War Ships In The Presidential Review.

OLD POINT COMFORT, Va., Feb. 22.—With homeward-bound pennants streaming far behind them, twenty-eight bands playing the "Star Spangled Banner" and saluting cannon roaring tribute to the President of the United States, the battleship fleet of the American Navy ended its world's cruise here today.

After steaming in review of the President, whose eagle-crested flag of blue was at the main of the cruiser yacht Mayflower, sixteen white battleships finally cast anchor in the same fairway of Hampton Roads whence they started fourteen months ago on the notable journey of 45,000 milles.

The joy of home-coming was written upon the face of every bluejacket and every officer on board the sixteen ships.

The long cruise, the visits to many of the most famous ports of the world, the homage that has been paid to the fleet by every nation favored on the calling list, have been sources of intense interest to every one aboard the famous vessels; but unquestionably there was no scene in all the world to compare in beauty with the familliar landmarks picked up by the battle fleet as it steamed, a triumphant self-reliant and efficient force, through the Virginia capes today and entered the home waters of Chesapeake bay and Hampton Roads.

As she led the beautiful columns of battleships ready for any emergency and bidding defiance to the storms or the tortuous channels of the strange waters of the hemispheres out of Hampto Roads fourteen months ago, and as she piloted the fleet through all the seas and into all the ports of the long cruise, the flagship Connecticut steamed again today at the head of the returning squadrons.

It the wake of the white ships of the home-coming fleet followed a welcoming host in gray—four battleships and five powerful cruisers being in this escorting column sent a thousand miles to sea to convey a preliminary word of welcome to the famous ship. The gray vessels, if it had not been for the abundance of American flags flying from their mastheads, might easily have been mistaken for foreign ships.

It will require a long while for the American people to become accustomed to the new color scheme adopted for the navy, the glistening white and buff since the days of the wonderful old "white squadron" having distinguished the American navy above all others, transforming into things of beauty, engines of destruction which in somber lines of neutral gray appear hostile and grim.

Foreign naval attaches, immense parties of government officials, high officers of the army and navy were aboard the fleet of welcome which steamed out today to greet the incoming vessels and to witness the review by the President at the Tail of the Horseshoe.

After the ceremonial greeting of the battleships and their escort, the Mayflower steamed herself at the end of the long column into Hampton Roads. When the homecoming vessels had anchored she took up a position in the center of the fleet.

Admiral Sperry and the other flag officers, together with the captains commanding, were received on board. To them President Roosevelt extended the cordial thanks which he expressed anew to the officers and crews of the four divisional flagships, the Connecticut, Louisiana, Georgia and Wisconsin, when he visited them this afternoon.

To the flag officers and captains commanding the ships of the battle fleet, on their assembly aboard the Mayflower, after the battleships had passed in review, the President expressed the thanks of the nation and his sense of greatness of their accomplishment in the course of the trip in belting the world.

Marriage Licenses.

Following is the list of the marriage licenses issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower since last Wednesday:

Richard Lambert, of Newburg, and Agnes Shaffer, of Tunnelton.

William Lacey Nugent and Mrs. Mary A. Frantz, of Friendsville.

Tony Russell Martin and Vespa Iona DeWitt, both of Albright, W. Va.

David J. Christian and Nettie Ann Swisher, both of Fairmont, W. Va.

William Johnson Utt, of Kingmont, W. Va., and Mary Ellen Wilson, of Pruntytown, W. Va.

Joseph Donald Weaver and Della Cummings, both of Ireland, W. Va.

William Harrison and Cora Male, both of Dodson, Md.

John Wesley Steyer and Ettie G. Thompson, both of Kearney, Md.

Two with request not to publish.

On January 1st a license was refused Gilbert Nelson Nuzum and Odie Fetty, both of Fairmont, on account of Nuzum, a divorced man, not being able to produce the divorce decree. On the 22nd inst. Nuzum exhibited the decree and a licensed was issued.

ALL READY FOR AFRICA

Mr. Roosevelt's Outfit Is Complete And In Shipshape.

Washington, Feb. 21.—The first full and complete statement of the plans for President Roosevelt's trip to Africa were given to the public this evening. This covers the President's inspiration, expectations, route, purposes, outfit, caravan, weapons, and a sketch of a goodly portion of Africa, which appears to be quite a continent.

It begins by the statement that "Theodore Roosevelt, 50 years of age, having, on March 4, with his retirement as twenty-sixth President of the United States, completed over 25 years of public service, has decided to take rest and recreation in a two years' trip abroad, half of which will be spent in Africa under the British flag as a faunal naturalist, and the other half in Europe, visiting at least three of the oig capitals."

The official party will consist of Mr. Roosevelt, his son Kermit, and three American naturalists, who are probably not "faunal"—Major Edgar A. Mearns, United States Army officer (retired); J. Loring Alden and Edmund Heller. The object of the hunt is not to hunt, but to make a collection of mammals, birds, reptiles, insects and botanical specimens to be deposited in the National Museum at Washington, a superb marble palace which probably will be completed in time to house the unprecedented and unparalled collection.

The party will leave New York the middle of March, going by the Mediterranean route to Gibralter and Naples. At Naples they will board a steamer for Kilndini harbor, Mombasa Island, Africa, where they will arrive toward the end of April. They will proceed by the Uganda railway to Nairobi, spend six months there, then go by rail to Port Florence, Lake Victoria, Nyanza. The party will cross Uganda by caravan, and finally pass down the whole length of the Nile arriving at Khartoum about April, 1910. At Khartoum Mrs. Roosevelt will join the party and accompany the President on his trip to Europe.

It is stated that the funds for the trip were secured by the Smithsonian Institution from a source which has not been revealed, but that it will not be paid out of the funds of the Smithsonian or of the Government. It is reported that the amount necessary has been donated by Mr. Andrew Carnegie. Mr. Roosevelt has stated that he himself will pay his own personal expenses and those of his son.

Major Mearns is a great ornithologist, Mr. J. Loring Allen is a great field naturalist, Mr. Edmund Heller is a great zoologist and Mr. R. J. Cunninghame, an Englishman, who will accompany the party, is a great shot.

The smaller mammals will be caught in traps, of which many of the latest models have been provided. The larger mammals will be shot with express rifles, and the most powerful rifles in the world has been secured. For Mr. Roosevelt six guns have been expressly manufactured. The first is a rifle of .405-caliber, carrying a 300-grain bullet, with which to shoot elephants and rhinoceri. The bullet at the time of impact has an energy of 3,500 pounds. The second rifle is a new United States Government rimless cartridge type, carrying a 230-grain bullet, to kill very large game at 500 to 1,000 yards. This is the lion gun. The third rifle is an extra light gun, 45.80 cartridge, with its most effective range at five yards. The fourth is a .400-caliber gun for moderate size game; it is of high power type. The other members of the party will be armed with similar guns and will also carry revolvers.

Every member of the party is said to be a dead shot, and all the large party of natives have been selected for their shooting ability. The country is reassured by the statement that if Mr. Roosevelt should happen to miss a lion or a rhinoceros the beast would be brought down by a fusillade of bullets before he could possibly reach the President.

While in Africa Mr. Roosevelt will write a number of articles on hunting for Scribner's Magazine, which is said to have contracted to pay him for these at the rate of $1 a word, and will also write editorials for The Outlook.

After the African hunt, on his visit of Europe, Mr. Roosevelt will lecture in German at the University of Berlin, in French at the Sorbonne in Paris, and in English at Oxford University, England.

DEATH RECORD.

BEULAH THAYER.

Beulah, the four-year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Thayer, of near Mountain Lake Park, died on last Friday, the 19th inst., after a long illness of progressive broncho-pneumonia. The remains were taken to Hoyes on Sunday and interred.

SOLOMON O. FRALEY.

Solomon O. Fraley, 64 years old, died of cousumption at the home of his son at Hutton. Twenty years ago Mr. Fraley left his home for the west. He returned two weeks ago, so ill he had to be helped from the train. He is survived by a wife, six daughters and two sons.

IMMENSE QUANTITIES OF MAPLE SUGAR MADE

Crop This Year Promises To Be a Bumper One.

Reports from the maple sugar producing section of Garrett county indicate that this year's harvest of maple sweets—sugar and syrup—will be a bumper one, the season having started out earlier than usual and is being prolonged by the very temperate weather with which the sugar makers have been favored.

While the product is larger than for many years past prices are very little lower, eight and ten cents per pound being paid for the sugar and the usual price of ninety cents per gallon for the syrup.

The amount of sugar produced by individual makers cannot be computed as yet, the season being still on, but with the warming up of the ground within the next week or two the production will be continued and large quantities will be added to the product already manufactured.

Mr. and Mrs. Ray White and son, Kenneth, accompanied by the lady's brother, sister and cousin, Mr. Alvin Kinter, Mrs. Myrtle Gasque and Miss Ethel Kinter, left for Sandy Creek, where they will locate. Mr. White will continue to hold his position in the city, but will spend Saturday and Sundays with the family at that place.—Grafton Republican.

Charles D. Smith, our Prosecuting Attorney, does not propose to be in the back ground with his brother attorneys, Harman and Valentine, therefore he is the father of another girl baby. Charles says that while he may be a little slow in filling up the rank and file of the bar with lawyers, yet he like his brother, Harman, is all right in filling the ranks of the stenographers.—Parsons Advocate.

The show presented in the opera house Monday night by the Mountain City Minstrels for the benefit of the local band, was a success from a financial standpoint, $132 being the net receipts. From any other than a financial veiwpoint, however, the show was not up to the standard, a redeeming feature being the orchestra work, which, considering the short time devoted to practice, was excellent.

William Weber, of Oakland, Md., was in the city today on a business visit. Mr. Weber is at the head of the famous H. Weber's Sons Company, the florists of Oakland and is one of the best known florists in the country. When the American Carnation Society was first organized Mr. Weber was elected as its vice president, and he has held many other positions of distinction in the world of flowers. He is the orginator of many beautiful specimens of carnations.—Grafton Sentinel.

The first thunder storm of the year occurred last Sunday afternoon about four o'clock when the heavens in the north and west clouded up and a severe electrical storm followed, accompanied by high wind, rain and hail. For more than an hour the haavens were streaked intermittently with vivid flashes of lightning and peal after peal of thunder followed. Toward nightfall conditions changed and cleared up. Tuesday morning a second electrical storm passed over this section. While the thunder was not so loud nor the lightning as vivid as on Sunday, the rain fell in a torrent for a short time. Tuesday's storm came from the east.

We had the pleasure of meeting Conrad Bodes, in Meyersdale, Tuesday noon. Mr. Bodes operated a woollen factory on Shade Run, about 2 miles northwest of Grantsville, Md., for a number of years. But that was more than a score of years ago. He went to Nebraska after quitting the woollen mill, locating near Lincoln, where he resided three years, then moved to Oklahoma, where he has become a prosperous farmer and land owner. He pronounces Oklahoma a veritable God's country, and we saw him on Tuesday he was about to take his departure for his western home, after completing a very enjoyable visit of several weeks' duration among his many friends in Garrett county, Md., and Somerset county, Pa. We have known Mr. Bodes from our boyhood, and as he is a dandy good fellow, we are much pleased to know that he is prosperous and happy.—Salisbury Star.

Prof. Frank W. Gandy, principal of the Terra Alta school, and Rev. J. B. Workman, of Oakland, were visitors last Monday.

The following program was rendered on Washington's birthday: "The American Flag," Ollie Green; "Character of Washington," Dean Skinner; song, "Mount Vernon Bells," school; "Washington at Long Island," Clyde Shartzer; exercise, "George Washington," fifth grade students; quintette, High School girls; "A Man Without a Country," John Martin; "Old Ironsides," Mary Porter; solo, Veronica Rasche, "Washington," Neil Fraley.

Lent Began Yesterday.

Yesterday was Ash Wednesday, a day that has been solemnly observed as a day of penitence for several hundred years in the Catholic church throughout the entire world. The day has a special significance, also, to the other Christian churches, as it marks the opening of the Lenten season The Catholics, the Lutherans, the members of the Reformed church and the Protestant Episcopal church especially observe this, the most solemn and impressive season of their church calendars, by self-denial and moderation in their worldly pleasures.

Ashby Family Reunion.

At the old William W. Ashby homestead, near Crellin, a family reunion was held on Tuesday when twenty-five members of the family gathered to celebrate the eighty-fifth anniversary of Mrs. Helen Ashby, widow of William W. Ashby. Those present on the occasion included children, grandchildren and greatgrandchildren. Of Mrs. Ashby's ten children five were present on the occasion. One of the children, Mrs. Thomas Peaslee, resides in Washington State; another is Mrs. Daniel Conneway, of Oakland. Mrs. Ashby is the sole surviving sister of the late Ralph Thayer, of Oakland, and is yet an active woman considering her advanced years. Mr. Ashby would have been one hundred years old had he lived until the present year. His death occurred seven years ago.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Marrying Again.

For a time Morton hesitated between the god of mirth and the God of mankind. His serious strain predominating, he said good by to a career as a humorist and became a preacher of the Word. The effervescence of his spirit, however, refused absolutely to be quieted at all times and many were the stories told of his witty sayings and his laughable pranks.

This was all years ago. Morton had married, had been blessed with a beautiful daughter and bereaved of a loving wife. After her death he became lost to the sense of his own humor. The blow had dulled his desire to scintillate. There was no longer music and laughter and grotesqueness in the by paths of his wanderings.

And then Imogene, his daughter went away to boarding school and left him in the house alone with the old servant. At vacation time she came home, a budding flower of beauty and innocence, to depart again leaving the place lonely and desolate.

At last she was graduated, returning to make home happy for her father. Her willing spirit flew far ahead of the train and dulled its swiftness into plodding. The duty she owed her parent was uppermost in her mind—not as a duty, but as a love, as a personification of affection which she would joy in portraying by making his days full of sunshine and comfort. She would be the mistress of his house and the rose of his heart!

To her sorrow, upon reaching the station she was met by a neighbor who advised the girl her father had been called out of town on urgent business. Arriving at the home, she found a telegram awaiting her. Nervously tearing open the envelope, she read:

"Have married a widow with five children. Will be home tonight."

"Father."

"Oh, how could he?" moaned the girl, as she threw herself prone upon the divan and wept. Then rising resolutely, she brushed away her tears. Why should she judge? He was her father, ripe and mature in his judgment. But now she would have to give up all her cherished plans for making him happy! There would be another—and five children!

At 7 o'clock the door-bell rang. In a moment the daughter was clasped in the arms of her parent.

"Where—where are they?" she asked, bewildered, as her gaze disclosed none but her father.

"Where's who, dearie?" asked the parent, a suspicious tremor making itself manifest at the corners of his lovable mouth.

"The—wid—I mean your wife—and the—"

"In Brandon?"

"Yes, you see the man wanted to change cars there, so I came on home."

"What man?"

"Why, the man I married."

"But you telegraphed me you married a widow with five children?" nonplussed.

"Yes, I did. I married a widow and five children to the man."

"Oh, father," cried the girl, hiding her face in his big overcoat, "how could you?"

Rag Time.

One of the closest friends I ever had was a pianist. He had a wonderful touch, that fellow. After feeling his touch innumerable times, I developed a great ear for music. I could hear his touch coming a block away. Then I used to hide my roll under the rug. He played a great deal by ear, and was so sensitive to sound he never failed to hear money talk. Then he would make one of those gentle touches of his and go out and tread the primrose path while I beat the life out of the typewriter for more meal tickets. But he followed a tune he was singing one night, and fell into the open draw of a bridge and died with a song on his lips. Poor soul!

HIS WAS A NOBLE LOVE.

"Is the contract of dower properly drawn up, signed and iwtnessed?" asked the court of Castle-on-the-Bum.

"Yes," sighed Gladys Golden.

"There are no loopholes through which your wise lawyers of Philadelphia might creep?"

"Not a loophole," said the fair Gladys.

"And your father's holdings in Amalgamated Whalebone, American Cheese and Macaroni and Tin Soupplate 6's have not been affected by the recent depression?"

"No, dearest," answered Miss Golden, firmly.

"Then I love you," said the noble count; and two fond hearts beat as one.—Judge.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE AGE.

Kind Old Gent—How old are you, my boy?

My Boy—Aw! Ma says I'm too young to eat the things I like, and I'm too old to cry when I don't get em.

The Distinction.

The common herd "Excuse me," say
If on your corns they chance to tread.
And "pardon me," in haughty way
Is by the middle classes said.
The ultra-ultra nothing say,
They look to you for thanks instead.

Indian Philosophy.

Quanah Parker, a Comanche chief, recently visited an ice plant in an Oklahoma town. He was much interested in everything pertaining to the plant. After he had been shown throughout the building, he remarked:

"White man smart. White man heap smart. White man smarter than God. God make ice in winter; white man make ice in summer."—Judge.

As He Saw It.

Mrs. Knox—One can tell a good deal about people from their facial expressions!

Knox—Been absorbing wisdom from a patent medicine almanac?

Mrs. Knox—No. Take Mrs. Jabberton, for example; there's a great deal of character in her mouth.

Knox—Yes—other people's.—Chicago Daily News.

Contributed.

"Did you ever hear this one?" asks a correspondent of the appended jest. We don't quite remember. Did you?

Young Man (to lady crossing muddy street)—Pardon me, miss, but you're holding your skirt pretty high.

Young Lady—Sir, I have a perfect right!

Y. M.—Sure—and a peach of a left, too.—Cleveland Leader.

A Beginning.

Judge Puffer—How do, Henry? Well, yew don't git down our way very often?

Uncle Henry—No; I stay pretty clus to home. Wouldn't 'a' come today but Marthy 's been readin' 'bout President Roosevelt wantin' farmers to improve, so she couldn't rest 'till I'd come an' get my teeth tinkered.—Judge.

A Practical Proof.

"Do you believe in the story of some people's having supernatural powers?"

"I didn't till I met a dentist who operated on young Brassy, and performed a miraculous feat."

"What was it?"

"He killed Brassy's nerve."—Baltimore American.

In the Balance.

"Mr. Bliggins has developed a habit of saying rude and sarcastic things," said Miss Sweet.

"Yes," answered Miss Cayenne. "I am waiting to see whether he is going to be recognized as a great bore or a social lion."

Conceited Hussy.

Evelyn—They say there is only one person in 15 who has perfect eyes.

George (with uncommon fervor)—In 15? There's only one in a million!

Evelyn—There you go again, George! Always flattering somebody!

One More Unfortunate.

Mrs. Backstoop—You have an occupation, have you? Well, what is it?

Padded Polhemus—Lady, I'll be honest with yer. I'm a parlor socialist, but jest at present I ain't got no parlor.—Puck.

Pandemonium.

"Nature knew what she was doing when she deprived fishes of a voice."

"How do you make that out?"

"What if a fish had to cackle over every egg it laid?"—Cleveland Leader.

Infallible.

Reader—How can you always tell whether a play is bad or good?

Critic—By the people who recommend it to me.—Cleveland Leader.

All by Itself.

Cholly—I'm afraid that glass of wine has got into my head.

Molly—It must be awfully lonely.

ROAD AND FARM IMPROVEMENT

A PRACTICAL ICEHOUSE.

There Is Yet Time to Build and Fill One.

The usefulness of ice on the farm can scarcely be exaggerated, and I wonder that such a small percentage of farmers possess a convenient storage. We have stored ice for about fifteen years. Five years ago the icehouse was remodeled and the following is a description of the prsent plan, writes a correspondent of Rural New Yorker. It is 12x14 feet and 12 feet high on a two-foot stone foundation. The studding is oak, 2x8 inches, sheathed on both sides and filled between with sawdust. From the studding a two-inch furring projects out with the siding on this, making an air space sufficiently large, that the sides of the building are kept from becoming warm by the cool current which passes from the ground up and into the ice chamber. A 12x18-inch blind at each gable permits a free circulation of air and is in my estimation better than a cupola as there is more of a draft over the ice. As is shown in the cut there are double doors four feet wide extending from the foundation to the eaves. A 4x4-inch scantling put in the peak for attaching a double pulley, facilitates the handling of the ice; the man in the wagon sets the tongs in a cake and another man in the doorway seizes it with his tongs as it is drawn up; in this way only three men are necessary at the building, one to unload and two to pack.

Beneath the building a number of eight-inch tiles are set on end with a little piece of board over each; on the dirt floor is six inches of sawdust. The cakes of ice are set on edge, each tier being finished and covered with a layer of sawdust before another is begun. It is better not to have the cakes too close together, so that the sawdust will sift down between. Sawdust is better than cracked ice to fill in with, as it does not leave air spaces and also prevents the cakes from freezing together so solidly. When filling, loose boards are placed in front of the doors and about ten or twelve inches back of them is filled in with sawdust. Our icehouse is filled from a pond about a mile away. Ice saws are used, and the cakes cut from 25 to 35 inches square; a common wagon box will hold two tiers, 30 cakes of 18-inch ice. The capacity of this icehouse is 40 tons, but of course any size could be built on the same plan, and a larger one would keep the ice in a much better condition.

BARLEY AND OATS.

Experiment of Growing Mixed Crop by Ontario Experiment Station.

Barley and oats grown as a mixed crop at the Ontario experiment station, gave in 1907 the highest yield of grain, 1,979 pounds per acre, where four pecks of each were used per acre. The mixture of Manshury barley and Daubeney oats has been found to ripen well together and to produce a lrge yield of grain. The results with crop mixtures of 12 and eight kinds of grain, in combinations made up of uniform weights of seed, or of quantities in the same proportion as when the crops are grown separately, showed the supremacy of Manshury six rowed barley when used in this way. In the average of six years' work and the results of 24 tests this variety represented 17.6 per cent. in the mixture.

Cow's Milk for Colts.

Cow's milk is often used with advantage in feeding foals. Foals suffering from distemper cannot always take solid food satisfactorily, and may be nurtured on cows' milk. The foal may be taught to drink by pouring it upon the grain feed; the young thing eats the moistened feed, and by tipping the pan it soon learns to drink the separated milk.

It is Strange.

"It is really beyond comprehension that every great cattle farmer, who is the owner of a valuable herd and knows it to be infected, does not take the simple precaution of isolating his calves from the full-grown animals of his stock and feeding them on uninfected milk."—Dr. Bang.

Sure to Cause Disease.

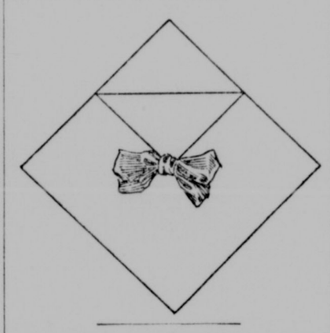
Confinement in dark, unventilated stables will not give tuberculosis, but it provides much more favorable conditions for the development and spread of the disease after the living germ is present.

CASE FOR THE HANDKERCHIEFS.

Easily Made from Left-Over Sewing Room Materials.

Materials.—Piece of velvet 18 inches by 9 inches, one piece of satin 18 inches by 9 inches, one piece of sheet wadding 18 inches by 9 inches. First powder the wadding with some good sachet. Now lay it between the velvet and satin and sew all three together on three sides (inside out). Turn the right side out now and blind-stitch the fourth edge. Double the whole in halves, having the velvet side out. Sew up one side and half of other two sides. Now turn over one of the portions that is still unsewed. Thus:

Fasten a large bow of ribbon of the same color as the satin to the point in the middle of the case.



FORECAST OF COMING MODES.

Reasonable Certainty That Hats Are to Be Smaller.

Hats and toques, turbans and their trimmings for the coming spring are already under consideration.

Hats, perhaps more than any other feature of dress, are most uncertain indications in the between-seasons of what the modes of spring and early summer will really be. Always there is the freak hat, the ridiculously-proportioned toque and the fearful and wondersome jumble of what to the casual observer seems the odds and ends of many a flower and ribbon shop made into one far from homogeneous whole, to top, but not adorn, the feminine head.

It would appear just now that the immense hats perpetrated on a comparatively inoffensive public last summer and autumn have been relegated to a permanent back shelf, for the so-called picture and large hats that are the latest creations of the French creators of millinery are but moderately large, while the extremely small toque is to be pushed to a momentary victory. The word momentary is used advisedly, for while the extremely small chapeau spells comfort for all but its wearer, whose eyes it cannot protect, it is the most trying of all millinery creations, and requires youth, beauty and plenty of hair, and a perfectly arranged coiffure to bear its trying exposure of every defect of face and coiffure.

As for the very large Moujik turbans that have been and are still in evidence, they are dying the natural death of all uncouth fashions, for no woman looks well with her head apparently buried in a cushion that bids fair to eclipse her entire head and face.

Turbans are among the latest creations, and those in jet are especially smart in Paris just now.

Very New Stocks.

Metallic laces have become so popular that, besides the gold tissues and filets for galloon trimming the newest stocks and yokes are being fashioned of tucked metallic fabrics. This sounds impossible, but the newer tulles in gold and silver are of a white silk weave, with an under thread of metal sheen showing through and producing an iridescent effect.

Many of the new stocks are made entirely of black velvet, except the top frill, which is lace, and the added lace jabot. When the stock itself is made of lace a wide butterfly bow of velvet is worn in front.

Transparent Sleeves.

It is rare to see a sleeve that is lined these days unless it is of rough cloth as a part of the waist fabric. Transparent sleeves are everywhere. They are of net, chiffon, filet, tulle and lace and are worn on cold days on the street under a coat.

They are conspicuously transparent, however, even in the house when the coat is removed. Added to their thinness—and this is the point—will be strips of the thickest fur to weigh them down.

Coiffures for Spring Hats.

The coiffure becomes less voluminous and more natural. Some of the false puffs are being put aside and the hair arranged more closely to accommodate the new spring hats, which will not need the abundance of hair which was almost necessary to prop up the drooping winter ones. Gauze, silver and gold bands are now drawn quite closely over the hair to hold it down.

COUNTESS WHO DOES NOT SHIRK AT HONEST TOIL

Important Improvement In the New French Three Inch Cannon.

A real countess earning her living as a sandwich woman, was the extraordinary spectacle seen on the boulevalds in Paris the other day. Two men and a woman, all dressed in long, black "Levitical" robes, were carrying the usual sandwich board advertising a weekly publication. There is nothing out of the way in sandwich women, but this particular specimen wore a copious, flaming red wig, whilst her two companions were bearded to the eyes, which were shaded with huge felt hats with "slouch" brims. It was impossible to mistake the disguises for anything but an imitation of the elusive murderers described by Mme. Steinheil. A crowd naturally followed this queer group, and made them the subject of ribald jests, to which, however, they paid no attention whatever. The lady naturally soon fell a prey to a reporter, and thus explained the situation:

"To begin with, I am the Countess of Rosemond, nee Chabot de Lussay, so that I was by no means born to the trade. I need not go into the circumstances which have forced me to earn my own bread. Like most society women, my education was totally defective in the ways of supporting myself. I am not strong enough to drive a cab like the Countess Lulgen, or to post bill. The business of sandwich woman is less exhausting and sufficiently well paid, and I can only say that I am well pleased thus honestly to satisfy my modest requirements. I certainly should prefer to be a millionairess, but when I receive 4 francs at the end of the day I am content. I have suffered so much in my life that I can approach this humble independence, and the money earned by my own efforts gives me greater pleasure and pride than my title and my old vanities."

From which it appears that the "sandwich Countess" is not only a very courageous woman, but a true philosopher and stoic.

One of the principal points to which the attention of the French military authorities is now directed, is how to increase the efficiency of the artillery in the face of numerical superiority of German batteries. In the recent parliamentary debates, the most weighty argument brought against additional guns was the difficulty that there would be in finding men to serve them. Colonel Depot, a well known expert, has just invented an improvement in the field gun of 75 millimetres (3-inch) that will enable the battery to be worked by five men instead of six. This would result in freeing 2400 men—or enough to serve 24 new batteries. His system consists in employing the recoil to open the breechlock, which then shuts automatically on the cartridge being introduced. There is also an ingenious contrivance for obviating the necessity of lowering the gun, the total weight is reduced by 6 cwt. for the gun and almost as much for the ammunition wagon. The last consideration renders Colonel Depot's new model particularly fit to use in the artillery attached to independent cavalry division.

In order to lessen the number of nocturnal attacks by Apaches the city has organized a service of night watchmen. The suburbs, which are also infested by criminals, also intend to take measures for the safety of residents. Asnieres is the first to take action. Recently a league was formed there with the object of assisting the police. It is a private enterprise, and the first subscriptions have been utilized in buying police dogs. The dogs are housed in a model kennel, which have been placed at the disposal of the police authorities. The dogs are a Belgian breed known as Grenadaels. The dozen of the animals is "Ture," who has already affected several arrests. When the league receives more funds it will established electrical communication between the kennel and the police headquarters at Asnieres.

A mysterious tragedy has occurred in an express train running between Paris and Chagny. In the train was Lieutenant Duplat of the Republican Guards, and his little daughter aged two years and a half. When the train reached Beaune the officer left his compartment and entering another, asked a passsenger for the loan of a pencil. Returning to his daughter, he wrote the following message on a sheet of paper:

"My dear Marie, I am unworthy of you. But I love you dearly. I have kissed baby before taking the step. Pray for me, for I love you. What has caused me to do this is lack of employment."

After writing these words the lieutenant wrappod the child in a warm covering, kissed her, and entering another compartment which was empty, lay down on seat and blew out his brains with his army revolver. In his pocket was his will, dated November, 1906, and a paper giving the address of a brother officer in Paris.

Lieutenant Duplat was a popular officer. The motive which he gave for committing suicide is not taken seriously. His family can give no reason for his rash act.

Wood Favored for Violins.

"On my last trip through country towns," said a traveling man, "I met a drummer who had a queer side line. He was buying up old church organs and was shipping the wood back to a violin manufacturer in New York. He said that the maker of violins thought that wood that had done service in one of those little cabinet organs was the best he could find for the average fiddle and he paid that drummer a small commission on every wornout organ he could pick up."

Did Not Worry Her.

Have the terrors of the French revolution been exaggerated? A French woman mentioned in Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff's diary had lived in Paris through the last 30 years of the eighteenth century, and when asked for her impressions of the tragic times of the terror replied: "The whole affair has been vastly exaggerated. For my part, I never found it necessary to abandon my weekly 'at home' days."

Other Folks' Joy.

We should be churlish creatures if we could have no joy in our fellowmortals' joy, unless it were in agreement with our theory of righteous distribution and our highest ideal of human good; what sour corners our mouth would get—our eyes, what frozen glances! and all the while our possessions and desires would not exactly adjust themselves to our ideal.—George Eliot.

Not for Hans.

Hans came in from his ranch to buy a horse. "I've got the very thing you want," said Ike Bergman; "it's a fine road horse, five years old, sound as a quail, $175 cash down, and he goes ten miles without stopping." Hans threw up his hands in protest. "Not for me," he said—"not for me. I wouldn't gif you five cents for him. I live eight miles out, und I'd half to walk back two miles."

Country of Contrasts.

Armenia is a country of strong contrasts, of opposite extremes, of heat and cold, light and shade, drought and moisture, and contains many mysteries awaiting solution. The ethnologist is still in doubt as to what branch of the great European family the Armenian people belong to; the philologist has not yet classified their language, the antiquarian knows next to nothing of their early history.

Revelations of Color.

Colors tell a tale. Feminine lugubrity shows a painful affection for musty blacks, for sickly fawns and rewsome grays. Those of overflowing vitality, on the other hand, love bright colors—orange, scarlet and blue. People of amiable, but rather indefinite character, show a decided preference for pale shadowy shades—pale-blue, pale-pink, white or cream.—Gentlewoman, London.

A Death Each Second.

The number of deaths in the world annually is 33,333,333, or 91,954 per day, 3,730 per hour, 60 per minute, or one per second. It is estimated that the population of the earth at the present time is being increased at the rate of about 16,500,000 annually.

Affectation.

Affectation is that spirit which prompts you to say to your guest: "Do you care for cream in your coffee?" when you know right well that it's milk you are passing, and mighty thin milk at that.

"As a Man Thinketh."

By JENNIE LUDLUM LEE.

Copyrighted, 1908, by the Associated Literary Press.

Carlisle Anderson pushed his way through the crowd and picked up the dog. The little creature had been run over by a passing automobile, and a crowd had gathered, but no one had offered to help the animal in its suffering. Carlisle was very big, and the onlookers seemed to give way to him without argument. One man suggested that the dog might bite.

"Poor little brute!" mused Carlisle as he started to the corner drug store with the dog in his arms. A clerk telephoned for the animal ambulance, and Carlisle still patted the dog.

The frightened animal looked up at him and, failing to recognize the friendly face, snapped at him. Carlisle drew back quickly, but not until the dog had bitten his hand. A cry made him turn quickly.

"Did he bite you?" asked a tall girl who had been buying some drugs at the counter.

"Yes, a bit of a scratch," acknowledged Carlisle. "It doesn't amount to much." But at the same time he mopped the blood from the hand.

"Won't you come around the corner with me to father?" pleaded the girl. "You see, father's a doctor, and he will cauterize the wound for you."

Before he knew it Carlisle was walking beside the girl, and together they entered the handsome residence of Dr. Theodore Standing.

"This doesn't amount to anything, sir," assured Dr. Standing.

"Oh, I don't think the little beast has given me hydrophobia," replied

"YOU'RE NOT GOING TO BITE, ARE YOU?" ASKED LUCY.

Carlisle. "You know, I believe you can think yourself into such things. I'll never give it another thought." And he laughed his merriest laugh.

Before leaving the house Carlisle looked around to see if he could catch a second glance of the doctor's daughter, but evidently she had gone upstairs.

That night in his room Carlisle thought very little about his bandaged hand, but somehow as he sat smoking his cigar and trying to read the evening paper a girl's face constantly appeared before him.

He did not think he was in danger of hydrophobia, but he did think he wanted to see that girl again. But how to do it? What excuse had he to offer? In the morning the hand was practically well, but Carlisle had his man tie it in clean bandages, and instead of scowling at the pain he actually smiled during the process.

An hour later found him in the doctor's office.

"My dear fellow, the hand is perfectly healed—it was nothing but a scratch." The doctor looked over the rim of his glasses in amazement.

"Think I needn't come again, then, do you?" inquired Carlisle.

"Certainly not," assured the doctor.

"Your daughter—er—she never helps you in the office, does she?" stammered Carlisle.

"Heavens, no!" declared the doctor. "I don't think she's even in the house."

Carlisle's face had lost a great deal of its animation when he walked down the stoop. His ruse had failed. He did not grudge the $5 he had paid the doctor. He would willingly pay five times that amount to see the girl again. But how?

A week later Mrs. Scott-Burden gave a small dinner, and Carlisle was among the last guests to arrive. In the dressing room he met Billy Brewster.

"Have you set your lamps on the Standing girl, Carlisle?" asked Billy. "Talk about your peaches!" he continued. "She's just out—the daughter of old Dr. Standing, you know, the old fellow that"—

He got no further. Carlisle walked up to him and took him by the shoulder.

"Is that girl here tonight?" he demanded.

"She certainly is," assured Billy, searching Carlisle's face to make sure he was entirely harmless. "But what's that to you?" he added.

"Help me to bind up this hand, will you?" asked Carlisle, ignoring the question.

"Well, I'll be hanged! What's the matter with you, anyway?" said Billy.

"A dog bit me," informed Carlisle as the task was completed and they started for the drawing room.

Mrs. Scott-Burden gave delightful dinners, and this one was no exception. Carlisle Anderson was seated beside the "peachy Standing girl." Billy Brewster leaned over toward his hostess.

"Did you ever hear that Carlisle Anderson had flighty spells?" he asked with some concern.

"All men do at times," answered Mrs. Scott-Burden. "At present he seems to be soaring with Lucy Standing. But why do you ask?"

"He did such a queer thing tonight about that perfectly good left hand of his." Then, directing his conversation to Carlisle, he sung out, "How's your hand, old man?"

"Better, thanks, better," Carlisle answered shortly and turned immediately to Miss Standing.

"Do you believe in this new thought fad, Miss Standing," asked Carlisle—"all this rot about thinking yourself into a lot of things and out of a lot more?"

"Don't be silly, Mr. Anderson," began Lucy in soothing tones. "You won't have hydrophobia; that little dog only scratched you."

"I'm not thinking about hydrophobia. It's an entirely different kind of disease."

"Incurable?" inquired Lucy.

"Can't say, never having had it before," said Carlisle as he laughed.

"Is it catching?" persisted Lucy.

"Can't say as to that either, but I hope so," announced Carlisle.

Lucy laughed, and the other guests wanted to know what the joke was.

"We were just discussing the new thought movement," interrupted Carlisle, in fear of Lucy telling the truth.

Later in the evening Carlisle and Lucy found themselves alone in a cozy nook in the library.

"Do you feel better?" asked Lucy as she poked her tiny feet close to the burning coals.

"Nope—getting worse every minute," announced Carlisle cheerfully as he pulled his chair a bit closer.

"You're not going to bite, are you?" asked Lucy, turning her head to a most tantalizing angle.

"This bandage of mine is getting very loose," began Carlisle. "Would you mind tying it up tighter for me?"

Lucy drew the knot in the large handkerchief a bit tighter, and as she touched the hand her face flushed. She glanced up into Carlisle's face and blushed again.

"Funny about that hand of yours," Lucy announced. "Father told me it was nothing but a scratch, and here you are nursing it for a week. Men are such babies. They think they are sick when really"—

"I am sick—in my heart," said Carlisle in a low voice.

"Mr. Carlisle!"

"What's that these new thought people keep saying, 'As a man thinketh, so is his heart is he?' And Miss Standing—Lucy—I can think of nothing but you. It's a new thought all right, and it's the best thought I ever had in my life. This hand with its hydrophobia symptoms" (here he ripped off the improvised bandage) "was used to stir up your sympathy. I kept thinking about that and decided it was not your sympathy, but you love, that I wanted."

"You want me," echoed Lucy slowly, as if in great wonderment.

"As I never wanted anything in my life," he affirmed. "Let me prove it to you, little girl, won't you?"

Footsteps were heard coming up the hall. There was no mistaking Carlisle's earnestness as he continued:

"At least don't say 'No' to me. Let me come and see you and maybe in time"—

The curtains parted, and Mrs. Scott-Burden entered to hear Lucy reply in a somewhat shaky voice:

"Well, you had better come around and see father—you know, he's the doctor."

French Peas Made In America.

A Paris little housekeeper who does her own cooking was asked by a neighbor who happened to be her guest how she could afford to have such delicious French peas so often when they were so expensive.

"I'll tell you my secret," said the hostess, "and that is that they aren't French peas at all. They are just the common American canned variety. But to give them the delicate French taste you must put about a teaspoonful of sugar with them while they are cooking, after you have seasoned them with the usual amount of salt, pepper and butter. Don't make the mistake of using too much sugar, though. A level spoonful to a can of peas is sufficient. A rather celebrated chef told my mother that long ago.

"He must have been a descendant of one of those devoted chefs of the 'terror' in France, when a cook was expected to make an entree out of a slipper if nothing else offered.

"He had a way of making indifferent coffee taste delicious, too, that I follow, and bless his memory for it. That is to pour the ground coffee into a tin, place this over the fire and wait till a rich aroma arises, but don't let there be any suspicion of burning. Then make your coffee in any one of the hundred correct ways you happen to have been taught and observe the improvement."—New York Post.

THE GEOGRAPHIC CHILD.

THE earth outside is like a nut
And inside full of flame.
They say it's like an orange, but
It doesn't taste the same.

Geography, geography, is such a pleasant study!
It tells you why the ocean's dry and why the desert's muddy.
I study it at morning and at afternoon, and then
I keep the teacher in so I may study it again.

The arctic circle is a swing
That teacher makes with chalk.
It's not a very pleasant thing
To go there for a walk.

A river is the funniest thing
That's on the map, I think.
It's sometimes like a piece of string,
And yet it's good to drink.

Volcanoes vomit melted stone
And ashes blazing hot.
It seems to me I'd hate to own
A stomach like they've got.

The sea is water by the sand
And very seldom dry.
It looks like bluing water, and
It tastes like when you cry.

A valley is a streak of land
That's something like a trough,
And if you get it on your hand
You have to wash it off.

Why France is buff and Russia blue
Nobody knows, perhaps.
But any one can see it's true
By looking at the maps.

A mountain is a bumps hurt;
An isthmus is a path;
An island is a lump of dirt
Surrounded by a bath.

Geography, geography, is such a pleasant study!
It tells you why the ocean's dry and why the desert's muddy.
I study it at morning and at afternoon, and then
I keep the teacher in so I may study it again.

Suburban Life.

Little Jennie was spending the day with the local clergyman's child, and for want of a better topic of conversation her little friend's mother asked her, "Does your papa say a pretty grace, dear?"

"Grace?" asked Jennie, mystified.

"Yes, dear. What did he say the first thing this morning, for instance?"

"Oh, I know," replied Jennie, her face brightening. "He said: 'Darn it all! I've only got five minutes to catch my train.'"—Puck.

IN THE HOUSEHOLD

VARIOUS TOPICS OF INTEREST FOR EVERY DAY.

Tinted Walls That Can Be Washed Are Growing in Favor—Safe Way to Fill Lamps—Use for Sacks.

Tinted Wall Waterproof.—Tinted walls that can be washed down are becoming more and more in favor for bathrooms, nurseries or school rooms, and if properly done they can be washed down and kept sanitary. One painter says now that the preparation of such a wall is not always thoroughly understood, so bad-looking streaks follow the first washing. A tinting material should be used that has no glue in it and does not need a glue size on the wall. This natural cement is applied directly to the plaster, and is then covered with a water enamel, which is given a coat of varnish when dry. With such treatment the wall can be washed down whenever necessary. The cost is comparatively little more than ordinary tinting, depending naturally upon the size of the room. For use in a schoolroom care should be taken that the tint is light enough to make a cheerful room and not absorb color in a way to injure young eyes. A warm yellow or a light green, almost a Nile, is, either one, an excellent choice.

To Fill Lamps.—If the oil for the lamps is kept in a five-gallon can in the porch, set it upon a shelf breast high. Then the lamps can be held directly under the faucet to be filled. It will save much in the way of an aching back and tired hands, and possibly leaking oil. If the lamps are kept on the same shelf, keep cleaning cloths and scissors hanging below the shelf. Save the paper bags and slip one over each chimney after cleaning so as to protect them from flies. If the lamps burn badly and give out a disagreeable smell, take them apart, put them in the wash boiler with a spoonful or two of soda and boil for an hour.

A Cleanly Precaution.—The housekeeper who every three months washes all the woodwork in her house with ammonia water and fills all the corners of shelves, bureau drawers, along the edges of the baseboard and every crevice that can be found in the house with powdered borax will find that she is not troubled with insects of any kind. When moving into a new house, before waiting to see if it is roach or ant infected, it is well to be prepared for them by this ammonia-borax treatment.

A Use for Sacks.—Save all the salt and sugar sacks; wash and boil and they can be put to various uses. Salt sacks are nice to strain jellies through; are also nice for baking veal or beef roll in. Sugar sacks make nice dish towels. Always keep some furniture glue in the house and when any of the furniture shows signs of coming apart apply. A very good liquid glue can be made by dissolving glue in nitric ether.—Housekeeper.

Scotch Snow Cake.

One pound of arrowroot, one-quarter of a pound of pounded white sugar, half a pound of butter, the whites of six eggs, flavor to taste with almond, vanilla, or lemon; beat the butter to a cream; stir in the sugar and arrowroot gradually, at the same time beating the mixture; whisk the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, add them to the other ingredients, and beat well for 20 minutes, put in flavoring, pour the cake into a buttered mold or tin and bake it in a moderate oven from one to one and one-half hours. This is a genuine Scotch recipe.

Homemade Tub for Baby.

A fine substitute for the expensive rubber bathtubs for infants may be made from a yard of rubber sheeting and a clothes basket. Saw off the handles from the basket, take heavy rubber sheeting and cover the top of the basket, leaving a depression in the sheeting. Use a rope and staple to fasten it to the outside rim of the basket. In this improvised bathtub the smallest infant may be laid for a bath with no danger of slipping. The regular bathtubs of this kind cost from $7 up.

Jolly Boys for Breakfast.

Sift thoroughly two and a half heaping tablespoonfuls yellow cornmeal, two heaping tablespoonfuls flour, one tablespoonful sugar, one saltspoon salt and one teaspoonful baking powder. Beat one egg, add to dry mixture with enough milk to make a drop batter. Stir in quickly half a teaspoonful melted butter. Beat well. Drop by teaspoonfuls into smoking hot lard.

Ten-Cent Coffee Cake.

One cup brown sugar, one cup seedless raisins, mix together and chop; four tablespoons of drippings, one teaspoon ground cinnamon, one-quarter teaspoon ground cloves, one teaspoon nutmeg, one cup cold coffee, one level teaspoon soda, 1½ cups flour, one teaspoon vanilla. Bake in moderate oven one hour. Cost about ten cents. Exceedingly good.

Sweep Sickroom.

When a patient is sick and a room cannot be thoroughly swept take a Turkish towel and wring out of strong salt water and wipe the carpet all over. It will take up all dust and make the room clean and sweet without disturbing the patient or raising dust.

HOYES.

Upton Cuppett, of Mt. Lake Park, spent Tuesday night with his parents at his old home.

W. A. and D. R. Smith attended the funeral of their little niece, Ivanore Thayer, at Thayerville. She was the daughter of George and Eliza Thayer of Mt. Lake Park.

Among the number from this place who attended the quarterly meeting at Friendsville Sunday night were Misses Ethel Dewitt, Sadie Wilburn and Messrs. Harry Lowdermilk, Charles Callis, Freeman Dewitt and sons Joseph and Stanley.

Wm. Callis and wife went to Sang Run last Sunday afternoon when Mr. Callis conducted preaching services in the absence of Rev. H. E. Friend.

Mrs. Mary Lower and little son of near Buckhannon arrived in Hoyes Tuesday on their way to visit Mrs. L's father, Rev. G. J. Ferguson.

Misses Emma Hamill, Bernadette Mattingly and Mrs. C. Johnson were out horse backing Sunday afternoon, but were hurried home on account of the storm.

Mrs. Sarah Friend and daughter Sadie left Hoyes last Friday for Oakland and Mt. Lake Park where they will visit relatives and friends for a few weeks.

Mrs. Dessie Harvey (nee Callis) is home on a visit to her parents this week.

Joe DeWitt, who has been working at Connellsville this winter, is home for an indefinite time.

Hamill Casteel and family spent last Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. A. C. DeWitt.

We are glad to see Jim Wilburn so much improved and able to be out again.

J. M. Loudermilk was at Sang Run Sunday visiting his brother William, who has been seriously ill.

Thomas Cuppett recently returned from Peroypolis, Pa., where he was called on account of the illness of his daughter, Mrs. J. H Enlow.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. Casper Kight, manager for the past eight or ten years of the general store of the Monroe Coal Mining Co. at Barnum, W. Va., has resigned his position to accept a much more lucrative one with the Kight Oil Co., whose principal office is in the same building at Barnum. He will make his headquarters at New Matamoras, Ohio, which is the nearest railroad point to the rich oil fields of the company. The company control quite an extensive piece of territory in the Ohio oil belt and have now four producing wells, pumping about $1,000 worth of oil per month. New wells will be commenced as soon as the weather permits and Mr. Kight has been selected by the stockholder directors to take entire charge and management of the field in all its details. The management of the two stores are resigned by Mr. Kight, the other operated by the Garrett Coal Co., at Dodson, Md. will be consolidated under one head by Mr. Dellinger, the present manager at the latter place. Harry Kight will be retained as clerk, at Barnum, the same position he held under his brother.

A very quiet wedding occurred in the M. E. church at this place on last Thursday evening at 8 o'clock when Mr. John Tibbetts and Miss Elrose Walsh, of Westernport, were married by Rev. Creek, pastor of the church. The groom is a well known miner, employed in mine No. 50, of the Davis Coal Co., and very popular with the young folks in this community. The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Walsh of Westernport. Mr. and Mrs. Tibbets will take up housekeeping at Beryl, W. Va., in a few weeks.

Mr. "Coon" Miller has a smile on his face that a ton of Sapalio could not brighten—it is the 13th child in the family and a boy.

English at the Universities.

To an American in England nothing is more surprising than the discovery that neither Oxford nor Cambridge provides any opportunity for the serious study of English. At Oxford, for example, there is only a single professor of English literature, whereas there are ten or a dozen at Harvard and Columbia.—The Forum.

Wasting Letters.

We have only a few letters in the alphabet, yet many persist in wasting them. Here comes M. Fleuron, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Brentt, Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. Perscey, Mr. Willcocks, Mr. Hammersleight, Mr. Maygonnigale, Mr. Maccrae, Miss Carrollyne Welles, Miss Mneulands, Georges Kheller, etc.—N. Y. Press.

New Book of Kings.

A fine book might be written upon the psychology of royalty, containing all the human documents that have come down to us from the rulers of the past. Such a book would make us think more kindly of those rulers—even of that long list of the kings of Israel of whom we are told nothing except that they did evil in the sight of the Lord.—London Times.

Seek for Words in Things.

It used to be a common saying of Mysen's that men ought not to seek for things in words, but for words in things; for that things are not made on account of words but that words are put together for the sake of things.—Diogenes Laertius.

No Book Hunters Now.

A well-known provincial member of that very honorable trade of second-hand bookselling said recently: "The hunt after rare books is as keen as ever, but I chiefly miss the young men who would mark down a book in my street-stall and would save up to buy it. There is plenty of book-buying, but there is no longer any book-hunting."—Hearth and Home.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1909. NUMBER 1

FORMER OAKLAND RESIDENT FOUND DEAD IN ROADWAY

Clarence Stemple, Resident of Preston County, Died Very Suddenly.

New reached Oakland yesterday morning of the very sudden death of Clarence Stemple, son of the late Benton Stemple, of Oakland, which occurred near Terra Alta the night previous.

Mr. Stemple resided on the Captain Shahan farm, about four miles from Terra Alta, and on Tuesday afternoon about four o'clock rode to his mailbox located along the road at some distance from his home. In going to the mailbox he had occasion to pass the residence of W. T. Groves, where he left his horse tied to the fence and continued his way to the box a short distance further. About seven o'clock Mr. Groves noticed that the animal was still tied to the fence and upon making an investigation he discovered the body of Mr. Stemple lying about a hundred yards from his gate with a letter and some newspapers in his hand, showing that he had gotten his mail and was on his way back for his horse when death overtook him.

As soon as possible the Terra Alta officials were notified of the death and in company with a surgeon the spot was visited when the physician determined that death was due to heart failure.

Mr. Stemple's wife was on a visit to friends at Breedlove at the time of his death, his mother, Mrs. Mary Stemple, of Oakland, having charge of the home during her absence. He was aged thirty-five years, two months and two days and leaves besides his wife, who is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Hartzer, of Oakland, three children.

The remains of the deceased will be brought to Oakland this afternoon and the funeral will occur tomorrow morning at ten o'clock from the Presbyterian church, of which he was a member.

ACCIDENT.

I am back once more.

At this writing we are having rain and mud to a finish, but no snow.

Mr. Gust Garringer has sold out and left for the Eastern Shore where he has purchased a farm.

Mr. Fred Richter has made sale and is going to locate in Kansas.

Mr. Wm. Spiker sold his farm near McHenry and is making sale of his personal property.

Mr. C. C. Spiker sold a bunch of two-year old cattle Saturday.

Mr. Wm. Miller has gone for a short stay at Fort Wayne, Ind.

FIRE AT DEER PARK.

Flames Consumed Home of Elias Reed There Sunday Evening.

Sunday evening in the absence of the family who was attending church the home of Mr. Elias Reed, at Deer Park, caught on fire and was entirely consumed, along with the greater portion of the household goods and clothing of the family.

The fire was supposed to have had its origin in the explosion or overturning of a lamp which was left in one of the rooms of the building when the family closed the house to go to church. When the fire was discovered by neighbors the entire house seemed to be in flames and it was only by the most heroic efforts that any of the furniture was saved, the only effects being those from the front of the house and easy to reach. The clothing of the family as well as the bedroom furniture was all consumed entailing a loss of nearly two thousand dollars upon which an insurance of one thousand dollars was in effect.

Obituary.

Departed this life, for the higher, on February 19, 1909, Beulah Ivanore, the little daughter of George and Eliza Thayer, aged three years, eight months and twenty-eight days. She had come like a sunbeam into her parents' home and for the few years of her life had gladdened their hearts with her sweet, childish prattle and winsome ways. She had been sick with complication of diseases for some time, but through it all was patient and uncomplaining. When the end came she fell asleep on the bosom of Him who loves the little children and gathers them in His arms.

Like a snowflake from Heaven soon floating in air,
Like the face of an angel so windrosy fair,
Like the rose and the violet and every sweet flower
Was this bud from God's garden our dear Ivanore.

She rests in the cemetery at Thayerville awaiting the resurrection morn. May the God of love comfort her parents and loved ones. C. W. HUTSON.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Nation's New Chief Executive is Emphatic In His Declaration of the Policies to be Pursued

EXTRA SESSION ANNOUNCED MARCH 15

Washington, March 4.—Following the ceremonies that marked his elevation to the office of chief executive of the United States, President Taft delivered his inaugural address, as follows:

My Fellow Citizens: Any one who takes the oath I have taken must feel a heavy weight of responsibility. If not, he has no conception of the powers and duties of the office upon which he is about to enter, or he is lacking in a proper sense of the solemnity of the occasion. Deeply impressed as I am with a sense of my own inadequacy, I am consoled by the thought that the responsibility really rests upon the whole American people, and that I shall have the support and the confidence of my fellow citizens in the discharge of my duties, which could not exist if they were not willing to trust me, and that I could not perform if I were unwilling to try.

I am anxious, first of all, to take advantage of the unique opportunity afforded me before assuming the new responsibilities of my office to address a few words to the people of the United States, to lay before them in brief compass my principles of government, and to give them my reasons in advance for the recommendations I intend to make to the congress in the matter of legislation and my policy concerning executive action.

It is to give a summary outline of the main policies of the new administration so far as they can be anticipated. I have had the honor to be one of the advisers of my distinguished predecessor and as such to hold up his hands in the reforms he has initiated. I should be untrue to myself, to my promises and to the declarations of the party platform upon which I am elected to office, if I did not make the maintenance and enforcement of those reforms a most important feature of my administration. They were directed to the suppression of the law-lessness and abuses of power of the great combinations of capital invested in railroads and in industrial enterprises carrying on interstate commerce. The steps which my predecessor took and the legislation passed on his recommendation have accomplished much, have caused a general halt in the vicious policies which created popular alarm, and have brought about in the business affected a much higher regard for existing law.

To render the reforms lasting, however, and to secure at the same time freedom from alarm on the part of those pursuing proper and progressive business methods, further legislative and executive action are needed. Relief of the railroads from certain restrictions of the anti-trust law have been urged by my predecessor and will be urged by me. On the other hand, the administration is pledged to legislation looking to a proper federal supervision and restriction to prevent excessive issues of bonds and stocks by companies owning and operating interstate commerce railroads.

Then, too, a reorganization of the department of justice, of the bureau of corporations in the department of commerce and labor, and of the interstate commerce commission, looking to effective co-operation of these agencies, is needed to secure a more rapid and certain enforcement of the laws affecting interstate railroads and industrial combinations.

I hope to be able to submit, at the first regular session of the incoming congress, in December next, definite suggestions in respect to the needed amendments to the anti-trust and the interstate commerce law, and the changes required in the executive departments concerned in their enforcement.

It is believed that with the changes to be recommended, American business can be assured of that measure of stability and certainty in the part of the law which is essential to its life and growth. To secure these results, which are so desirable to all of us, requires the best efforts of the wisest men. It will take time to bring about the changes necessary, and to execute the laws when changed so as to produce the certainty and promptness in the administration of justice which is required. Nothing will contribute more to an early restoration of confidence and revival of business activity than the knowledge on the part of the business community that these changes are to be undertaken in a conservative spirit, based on sober second thought, and long consideration, and remembering that while our laws may always be improved, they are now good enough to secure the prosperity and happiness of the people if honestly executed.

Extra Session March 15 to Consider Revision of Tariff.

A matter of most pressing importance is the revision of the tariff. In accordance with the promise of the platform upon which I was elected, I shall call congress into extra session to meet on the fifteenth day of March in order that consideration may be at once given to a bill revising the Dingley act. This should secure an adequate revenue and adjust the duties in such a manner as to afford to labor and to all industries in this country, whether of the farm, mine or factory, protection by tariff equal to the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here, and have a provision which shall put into force upon executive determination of certain facts, a higher or maximum tariff against those countries whose trade policy toward us seemingly requires such discrimination. It is thought that there has been such a change in conditions since the enactment of the Dingley act drafted on a similarly protective principle, that the measure of the tariff above stated will permit the reduction of rates in certain schedules and will require the advancement of few, if any.

The proposal to revise the tariff made in such an authoritative way as to lead the business community to count upon it, necessarily halts all those branches of business directly affected, and as these are most important, it disturbs the whole business of the country. It is imperatively necessary, therefore, that a tariff bill be

SHY ON SUNSHINE.

Snowstorms and Sleet Will Help in Making March Weather.

Peter R. Smith predicts the weather for March as follows:

March will fall below the average of the months for sunshine. A number of exciting causes will center at different dates in the month adding vigor to the meteorology and also prolonging disturbed conditions. Rain, snowstorms, and sleet will show up much over the country and in many parts in a vigorous way.

March will open with cold, spasmodic weather, which will be quickened about the 3d, 4th and 5th. Then at these dates areas of rain, sleet, and snow will be spreading eastward, followed by a very cold wave much intensified in northern sections, which may reach the proportions of a blizzard there.

The 10th is the center of a disturbed period which runs from the 8th to the 12th. The equinoctial forces will add vigor to the period. Rain, snow, and wind will prevail in most parts. Wind and rain will be more forceful in many parts of the south than elsewhere, except in the north, where snow may dominate. After the passage of this wave the weather will be cooler.

The 15th, 16th and 17th are dates denoting storm days, on which rain and snow flurries will show up in the central valleys. In southern parts rain and thunder will be much more vigorous than elsewhere. In the north snowstorms may reach drifting proportion as the north wind changes to the northwest.

From the 19th to the 23d denotes a period of general storminess, reaching all sections in some form of disturbance. A high temperature and humidity will prevail about the 21st. Forceful rains and wind will be developed along the passage of the waves as they spread over country and much intense thunder will prevail. On the western tangent of the wave in northern parts snow storms of much vigor will show up forming drifts and blockades as the winds from the northwest reach sweeping gales.

The last period of unsettled weather in March is the 27th, 28th and 29th. On these dates cloudiness and tendency to rain or snow will prevail.

A Pleasant Entertainment.

Following the regular session of Garrett Lodge, Knights of Pythias, last Friday evening the members of the organization and their families and friends spent a pleasant and profitable hour when Prof. U. G. Palmer gave a stereopticon lecture on the beauties of California and other western states. The views presented to the audience were exceptionally good and Mr. Palmer being an interesting as well as an entertaining talker added a zest to the occasion. Quite a large company was present and all were well pleased.

REPUBLICAN MUNICIPAL CONVENTION TONIGHT

Three Members of Council Will Be Nominated to Serve Two Years.

Elsewhere in this paper today is published a call signed by Chairman A. G. Sturgiss for a municipal convention to be held this evening for the purpose of nominating a municipal ticket composed of three candidates for members of the Town Council.

The affairs of the town, with the contemplated erection of a water and sewerage system and the consequent handling and expenditure of a large sum of public money during the next year or two, should appeal to every resident of the town to aid in nominating and electing none but prudent and experienced business men of good judgment and unimpeachable character.

Let every person having the future welfare and good of his municipal government at heart attend this meeting and assist in nominating a splendid ticket of representative citizens.

To Sell Coal Company.

The holdings of the Niagara Coal & Coke Company will be offered for sale at Morgantown on Saturday, March 13, unless the claims against the company are satisfied before that time. The sale will be conducted by P. J. Crogan, trustee for J. W. McCullough of Friendsville, Md., who holds a deed of trust on the property. The land, comprising about 61 acres, is located on the west side of the Monongahela river just opposite Round Bottom. Besides the money spent in opening the mine a tipple was constructed and a lot of equipment purchased.

The land was purchased by the company from Nimrod Cole. A little more than a year ago the company leased the property to Deisenberry & Miller of Morgantown, who, in turn, leased it to a company of Fairmont people organized under the name of the Grant Coal & Coke Company. Under the terms of the lease the Grant company was to take care of all indebtedness, a part of which was the claim of McCullough for $8,700.

The company's holdings are valued at about $50,000 by the directors, R. E. L. Allen, S. B. Allen, Herschel Protzman of Morgantown, and George and Joseph Haubtt of Cumberland.

Livery Removed.

Messrs. Maroney Bros., the Quality Hill liverymen, have removed from their old location to the Helbig barn which was recently vacated by Mr. J. A. Kelly. The equipment of the Maroney Bros. stable compares very favorably with that of other liverymen and they aim to please their patrons.

drawn in good faith in accordance with promises made before the election by the party in power, and as promptly passed as due consideration will permit. It is not that the tariff is more important in the long run than the perfecting of the reforms in respect to anti-trust legislation and interstate commerce regulation, but the need for action when the revision of the tariff has been determined upon, is more immediate to avoid embarrassment of business. To secure the needed speed in the passage of the tariff bill, it would seem wise to attempt no other legislation at the extra session. I venture this as a suggestion only, for the course to be taken by congress upon the call of the executive, is wholly within its discretion.

Graduated Inheritance Tax Is Recommended.

In the making of a tariff bill, the prime motive is taxation, and the securing thereby of a revenue. Due largely to the business depression which followed the financial panic of 1907, the revenue from customs and other sources has decreased to such an extent that the expenditures for the current fiscal year will exceed the receipts by $100,000,000. It is imperative that such a deficit shall not continue, and the framers of the tariff bill must of course have in mind the total revenues likely to be produced by it, and so arrange the duties as to secure an adequate income. Should it be impossible to do so by import duties, new kinds of taxation must be adopted, and among these I recommend a graduated inheritance tax, as correct in principle and as certain and easy of collection.

The obligation on the part of those responsible for the expenditures made to carry on the government, to be as economical as possible, and to make the burden of taxation as light as possible, is plain and should be affirmed in every declaration of government policy. This is especially true when we are face to face with a heavy deficit. But when the desire to win the popular approval leads to the cutting off of expenditures really needed to make the government effective, and to enable it to accomplish its proper objects, the result is as much to be condemned as the waste of government funds in unnecessary expenditure. The scope of a modern government in what it can and ought to accomplish for its people has been widened far beyond the principles laid down by the old laissez faire school of political writers, and this widening has met popular approval.

In the department of agriculture, the use of scientific experiments on a large scale, and the spread of information derived from them for the improvement of general agriculture, must go on.

The importance of supervising business of great railways and industrial combinations, and the necessary investigation and prosecution of unlawful business methods, are another necessary tax upon government which did not exist half a century ago.

Necessary Work Calling for Large Expenditure.

The putting into force of laws which shall secure the conservation of our resources, so far as they may be within the jurisdiction of the federal government, including the most important work of saving and restoring our forests, and the general improvement of waterways, are all proper government functions which must involve large expenditure if properly performed. While some of them, like the reclamation of arid lands, are made to pay for themselves, others are of such an indirect benefit that this cannot be expected of them. A permanent improvement, like the Panama canal, should be treated as a distinct enterprise, and should be paid for by the proceeds of bonds, the issue of which will distribute its cost between the present and future generations in accordance with the benefits derived. It may well be submitted to the serious consideration of congress whether the deepening and control of the channel of a great river system, like that of the Ohio or of the Mississippi, when definite and practical plans for the enterprise have been approved and determined upon, should not be provided for in the same way.

Then, too, there are expenditures of government absolutely necessary if our country is to maintain its proper place among the nations of the world, and is to exercise its proper influence in defense of its own trade interests, in the maintenance of traditional American policy against the colonization of European monarchies in this hemisphere, and in the promotion of peace and international morality. I refer to the cost of maintaining a proper army, a proper navy and suitable fortifications upon the mainland of the United States and in its dependencies.

We should have an army so organized, and so officered, as to be capable in time of emergency, in co-operation with the national militia, and under the provisions of a proper national volunteer law, rapidly to expand into a force sufficient to resist all probable invasion from abroad and to furnish a respectable expeditionary force, if necessary, in the maintenance of our traditional American policy which bears the name of President Monroe.

Strong Plea Is Made for Adequate Army and Navy.

Our fortifications are yet in a state of only partial completeness and the number of men to man them is insufficient. In a few years, however, the usual annual appropriations for our coast defenses both on the mainland and in the dependencies, will make them sufficient to resist all direct attack, and by that time we may hope that the men to man them will be provided as a necessary adjunct. The distance of our shores from Europe and Asia of course reduces the necessity for maintaining under arms a great army, but it does not take away the requirement of mere prudence, that we should have an army sufficiently large and so constituted as to form a nucleus out of which a suitable force can quickly grow.

What has been said of the army may be affirmed in even a more emphatic way of the navy. A modern navy cannot be improvised. It must be built and in existence when the emergency arises which calls for its use and operation. My distinguished predecessor has in many speeches and messages set out with great force and striking language the necessity for maintaining a strong navy commensurate with the coast line, the governmental resources and the foreign trade of our nation; and I wish to reiterate all the reasons which he has presented in favor of the policy of maintaining a strong navy as the best conservator of our peace with other nations and the best means of securing respect for the assertion of our rights, the defense of our interests and the exercise of our influence in international matters.

Our international policy is always to promote peace. We shall enter into any war with a full consciousness of the awful consequences that it always entails, whether successful or not, and we, of course, shall make every effort, consistent with national honor and the highest national interest, to avoid a resort to arms. We favor every instrumentality, like that of The Hague tribunal and arbitration treaties made with a view to its use in all international controversies, in order to maintain peace and to avoid war. But we should be blind to existing conditions, and should allow ourselves to become foolish idealists, if we did not realize that with all the nations of the world armed and prepared for war, we must be ourselves in a similar condition, in order to prevent other nations from taking advantage of us and of our inability to defend our interests and assert our rights with a strong hand. In the international controversies that are likely to arise in the orient, growing out of the question of the open door and other issues, the United States can maintain her interests intact and can secure respect for her just demands. She will not be able to do so, however, if it is understood that she never intends to back up her assertion of right and her defense of her interest by anything but mere verbal protest and diplomatic note. For these reasons, the expenses of the army and navy and of coast defenses should always be considered as something which the government must pay for, and they should not be cut off through mere consideration of economy. Our government is able to afford a suitable army and a suitable navy. It may maintain them without the slightest danger to the republic or the cause of free institutions, and fear of additional taxation ought not to change a proper policy in this regard.

The policy of the United States in the Spanish war, and since, has given it a position of influence among the nations that it never had before, and should be constantly exerted to securing to its bona fide citizens, whether native or naturalized, respect for them as such in foreign countries. We should make every effort to prevent humiliating and degrading prohibition against any of our citizens wishing temporarily to sojourn in foreign countries, because of race or religion.

Sees Serious Defect in Present Federal Jurisdiction.

The admission of Asiatic immigrants who can not be amalgamated with our population has been made the subject either of prohibitory clauses in our treaties and statutes, or of strict administrative regulation secured by diplomatic negotiation. I sincerely hope that we may continue to minimize the evils likely to arise from such immigration without unnecessary friction and by mutual concessions between self-respecting governments. Meantime, we must take every precaution to prevent, or, failing that, to punish outbursts of race feeling among our people against foreigners of whatever nationality who have by our grant a treaty right to pursue lawful business here and to be protected against lawless assault or injury.

This leads me to point out a serious defect in the present federal jurisdiction which ought to be remedied at once. Having assured to other countries by treaty the protection of our laws for such of their subjects or citizens as we permit to come within our jurisdiction, we now leave to a state or a city, not under the control of the federal government, a duty of performing our international obligations in this respect. By proper legislation we may, and ought to, place in the hands of the federal executive the means of enforcing the treaty rights of such aliens in the courts of the federal government. It puts our government in a pusillanimous position to make definite engagements to protect aliens and then to excuse the failure to perform those engagements by an explanation that the duty to keep them is in states or cities, not within our control. If we would promise, we must put ourselves in a position to perform our promise. We cannot permit the possible failure of justice due to local prejudice in any state or municipal government to expose us to the risk of a war which might be avoided if federal jurisdiction was asserted by suitable legislation by congress and carried out by proper proceedings instituted by the executive in the courts of the national government.

Reforms Called for in Monetary and Banking Laws.

One of the reforms to be carried out during the incoming administration is a change of our monetary and banking laws, so as to secure greater elasticity in the forms of currency available for trade, and to prevent the limitations of law from operating to increase the embarrassments of a financial panic. The monetary commission lately appointed is giving full consideration to existing conditions and to all proposed remedies, and will doubtless suggest one that will meet the requirements of business and of public interest. We may hope that the report will embody neither the narrow view of those who believe that the sole purpose of the new system should be to secure a large return on banking capital or of those who would have greater expansion of currency with little regard to provisions for its immediate redemption or ultimate security. There is no subject of economic discussion so intricate and so likely to evoke differing views and dogmatic statements as this one. The commission in studying the general influence of currency on business and of business on currency, have wisely extended their investigation in European banking and monetary methods. The information that they have derived from such experts as they have found abroad will undoubtedly be found helpful in the solution of the difficult problem they have in hand.

Urges Prompt Passage of Postal Savings Bank Bill.

The incoming congress should promptly fulfill the promise of the Republican platform and pass a proper postal savings bank bill. It will not be unwise or excessive paternalism. The promise to repay by the government will furnish an inducement to savings deposits which private enterprise cannot supply, and at such a low rate of interest as not to withdraw custom from existing banks. It will substantially increase the funds available for investment as capital in useful enterprises. It will furnish the absolute security which makes the proposed scheme of government guaranty of deposits so alluring without its pernicious results.

I sincerely hope that the incoming congress will be alive, as it should be, to the importance of our foreign trade and of encouraging it in every way feasible. The possibility of increasing this trade in the orient, in the Philippines and in South America are known to everyone who has given the matter attention.

The importance which the department of agriculture and of commerce and labor may play in ridding the markets of Europe of prohibitions and discriminations against the importation of our products is fully understood, and it is hoped that the use of the maximum and minimum feature of our tariff law to be soon passed will be effective to remove many of those restrictions.

No Prospect of Failure in Building of Panama Canal.

The Panama canal will have a most important bearing upon the trade between the eastern and the far western sections of our country, and will greatly increase the facilities for transportation between the eastern and western seaboard, and may possibly revolutionize the transcontinental rates with respect to bulky merchandise. It will also have a most beneficial effect to increase the trade between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the western coast of South America, and, indeed, with some of the important ports on the east coast of South America reached by rail from the west coast. The work on the canal is making most satisfactory progress. The type of the canal as a lock canal was fixed by congress after a full consideration of the conflicting reports of the majority and minority of the consulting board, and after the recommendation of the war department and the executive upon those reports. Recent suggestion that something had occurred on the isthmus to make the lock type of the canal less feasible than it was supposed to be when the reports were made and the policy determined on, led to a visit to the isthmus of a board of competent engineers to examine the Gatun dam and locks which are the key of the lock type. The report of that board shows that nothing has occurred in the nature of newly revealed evidence which should change the views once formed in the original discussion. The construction will go on under a most effective organization controlled by Col. Goethals and his fellow army engineers associated with him, and will certainly be completed early in the next administration, if not before.

Some type of canal must be constructed. The lock type has been selected. We are all in favor of having it built as promptly as possible. We must not now, therefore, keep up a fire in the rear of the agents whom we have authorized to do our work on the isthmus. We must hold up their hands, and speaking for the incoming administration, I wish to say that I propose to devote all the energy possible and under my control, to the pushing of this work on the plans which have been adopted, and to stand behind the men who are doing faithful hard work to bring about the early completion of this, the greatest constructive enterprise of modern times.

The governments of our dependencies in Porto Rico and the Philippines are progressing as favorably as could be desired. The prosperity of Porto Rico continues unabated. The business conditions in the Philippines are not all that we could wish them to be, but with the passage of the new tariff bill permitting free trade between the United States and the archipelago, with such limitations in sugar and tobacco as shall prevent injury to the domestic interests on those products, we can count on an improvement in business conditions in the Philippines and the development of a mutually profitable trade between this country and the islands. Meantime our government in each dependency is upholding the traditions of civil liberty and increasing popular control which might be expected under American auspices. The work which we are doing there redounds to our credit as a nation.

Praise Accorded Progress Made by the Negro Race.

I look forward with hope to increasing the already good feeling between the south and the other sections of the country. My chief purpose is not to effect a change in the electoral vote of the southern states. That is a secondary consideration. What I look forward to is an increase in the tolerance of political views of all kinds and their advocacy throughout the south, and the existence of a respectable political opposition in every state; even more than this, to an increased feeling on the part of all the people in the south that this government is their government, and that its officers in their states are their officers.

The consideration of this question cannot, however, be complete and full without reference to the negro race, its progress and its present condition. The 13th amendment secured them freedom; the 14th amendment due process of law, protection of property and the pursuit of happiness; and the 15th amendment attempted to secure the negro against any deprivation of the privilege to vote, because he was a negro. The 13th and 14th amendments have been generally enforced and have secured the objects for which they were intended. While the 15th amendment has not been generally observed in the past, it ought to be observed, and the tendency of southern legislation to-day is toward the enactment of electoral qualifications which shall square with that amendment. Of course, the mere adoption of a constitutional law is only one step in the right direction. It must be fairly and justly enforced as well. In time both will come. Hence it is clear to all that the domination of an ignorant, irresponsible element can be prevented by constitutional laws which shall exclude from voting both negroes and whites not having education or other qualifications thought to be necessary for a proper electorate. The danger of the control of an ignorant electorate has therefore passed. With this change, the interest which many of the southern white citizens take in the welfare of the negroes has increased. The colored man must base their hope on the results of their own industry, self-restraint, thrift and business success, as well as upon the aid and comfort and sympathy which they may receive from their white neighbors of the south. There was a time when northerners who sympathized with the negro in his necessary struggle for better conditions sought to give to him the suffrage as a protection, and to enforce its exercise against the prevailing sentiment of the south. The movement proved to be a failure. What remains is the 15th amendment to the constitution and the right to have statutes of states specifying qualifications for electors subjected to the test of compliance with that amendment. This is a great protection to the negro. It will never be repealed, and it never ought to be repealed. If it had not been passsed, it might be difficult now to adopt it; but with it in our fundamental law, the policy of southern legislation must and will tend to obey it, and so long as the statutes of the states meet the test of this amendment and are not otherwise in conflict with the constitution and laws of the United States it is not the disposition or within the province of the federal government to interfere with the regulation by southern states of their domestic affairs. There is in the south a stronger feeling than ever among the intelligent, well-to-do and influential element in favor of the industrial education of the negro and the encouragement of the race to make themselves useful members of the community. The progress which the negro has made in the last 50 years from slavery, when its statistics are reviewed, is marvelous, and it furnishes every reason to hope that in the next 25 years a still greater improvement in his condition as a productive member of society, on the farm, and in the shop and in other occupations, may come. The negroes are now Americans. Their ancestors came here years ago against their will, and this is their only country and their only flag. They have shown themselves anxious to live for it and willing to die for it. Encountering the race feeling against them, subjected at times to cruel injustice growing out of it, they may well have our profound sympathy and aid in the struggle they are making. We are charged with the sacred duty of making their path as smooth and easy as we can. Any recognition of their distinguished men, any appointment to office from among their number, is properly taken as an encouragement, and an appreciation of their progress, and this just policy shall be pursued.

Coming Era of Better Feeling Between Whites and Negroes.

But it may well admit of doubt whether, in the case of any race, an appointment of one of their number to a local office in a community in which the race feeling is so widespread and acute as to interfere with the ease and facility with which the local government business can be done by the appointee, is of sufficient benefit by way of encouragement to the race to outweigh the recurrence and increase of race feeling with such an appointment is likely to engender. Therefore, the executive, in recognizing the negro race by appointments, must exercise a careful discretion not thereby to do it more harm than good. On the other hand we must be careful not to encourage the mere pretense of race feeling manufactured in the interest of individual political ambition.

Personally I have not the slightest race prejudice or feeling, and recognition of its existence only awakens in my heart a deeper sympathy for those who have to bear it or suffer from it, and I question the wisdom of a policy which is likely to increase it. Meantime, if nothing is done to prevent, a better feeling between the negroes and the whites in the south will continue to grow, and more and more of the white people will come to realize that the future of the south is to be much benefited by the industrial and intellectual progress of the negro. The exercise of political franchises by those of his race who are intelligent and well-to-do will be acquiesced in, and the right to vote will be withheld only from the ignorant and irresponsible of both races.

Is Squarely in Favor of Proper Labor Legislation.

There is one other matter to which I shall refer. It was made the subject of great controversy during the election, and calls for at least a passing reference now. My distinguished predecessor has given much attention to the cause of labor, with whose struggle for better things he has shown the sincerest sympathy. At his instance, congress has passed the bill fixing the liability of interstate carriers to their employes for injury sustained in the course of employment, abolishing the rule of fellow-servant and the common law rule as to contributory negligence. It has also passed a law fixing the compensation of government employes for injuries sustained in the employ of the government through the negligence of the superior. It also passed a model child labor law for the District of Columbia. In previous administrations an arbitrary law for interstate commerce railroads and their employes, and laws for the application of safety devices to save the lives and limbs of employes of interstate railroads had been passed. Additional legislation of this kind was passed by the outgoing congress.

I wish to say that in so far as I can, I hope to promote the enactment of further legislation of this character.

Question of Injunctions in Industrial Disputes.

Another labor question has arisen which has awakened the most excited discussion. That is in respect to the power of the federal courts to issue injunctions in industrial disputes. As to that, my convictions are fixed. Take away from the courts, if it could be taken away, the power to issue injunctions in labor disputes, and it would create a privileged class among the laborers and save the lawless among their number from a most needful remedy available to all men for the protection of their business against lawless invasion. The proposition that business is not a property or pecuniary right which can be protected by equitable injunction is utterly without foundation in precedent or reason. The proposition is usually linked with one to make the secondary boycott lawful. Such a proposition is at variance with the American instinct and will find no support in my judgment when submitted to the American people. The secondary boycott is an instrument of tyranny, and ought not to be made legitimate.

The issuing of a temporary restraining order without notice has in several instances been abused by its inconsiderate exercise, and to remedy this, the platform upon which I was elected recommends the formulation in a statute of the conditions under which such a temporary restraining order ought to issue. A statute can and ought to be framed to embody the best modern practice, and can bring the subject so closely to the attention of the court as to make abuses of the process unlikely in the future. American people, if I understand them, insist that the authority of the courts shall be sustained and are opposed to any change in the procedure by which the powers of a court may be weakened and the fearless and effective administration of justice be interfered with.

Having thus reviewed the questions likely to recur during my administration, and having expressed in a summary way the position which I expect to take in recommendations to congress and in my conduct as an executive, I invoke the considerate sympathy and support of my fellow citizens and the aid of Almighty God in the discharge of my responsible duties.

In the Millenium.

The probability is that, if there were a city composed of none but good men, it would be an object of competition to avoid the possession of power, just as now it is to obtain it; and then it would become clearly evident that it is not the nature of the genuine ruler to look to his own interest, but to those of his subject; so that every judicious man would choose to be a recipient of benefits, rather than to have the trouble of conferring them upon others.—Plato.

Sorry for the Lightkeeper.

While the dear old country gentleman and his wife were walking on the beach one evening they suddenly noticed the revolving light of a lightship. The old lady gazed at it with open eyes for some minutes, then she turned to her husband with a puzzled look. "Well," she exclaimed, "if the man in that ship hasn't lit that light this 40 times, and it has gone out everytime!"

Philip and the Ethiopian

Sunday School Lesson for March 7, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts. 8:26-38. Memory verses 29-31.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.—John 5:39.

TIME.—Summer of A. D. 36 or 37. So after the last lesson.

PLACE.—Where the road from Samaria to Gaza crosses or joins the road from Jerusalem to Gaza; in the uncultivated region southwest of Jerusalem, toward the old Philistine country.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

Vs. 27, 28. "A man of Ethiopia." A general term for the lands south of Egypt. But from the name of Queen Candace it was probably Meroe, a country which lay on the right bank of the Nile from its junction with the Atbara, as far as Khartoum, and thence to the east of the blue Nile to the Abyssinian mountains. "Of great authority." A man of power, of wide influence, a prince.

V. 28. "Was returning." Guided by Providence at exactly the right time. "Read" (was reading). "Esaias." Greek form of Isaiah. He was reading aloud as was the custom, so that Philip was able to hear it. It was a pleasant and profitable custom on long journeys.

Reading Aloud. "The great Jewish teachers insisted, in many instances, upon their scholars reading aloud." "I speak to the experience, probably, of many, when I say that utterance aloud is often a very powerful aid to mental retentiveness," says Joseph Parker. It is more than this, reading aloud helps us to understand the meaning of the Word. For in order to read well we must understand every shade of the meaning, or we will misinterpret God's Word. A monotonous, sing-song, woodeny, or artificial reading, such as we often hear, comes very near to being a crime, for it deprives the Word of its natural meaning, and makes the hearers inattentive, or repels them from the Word.

Those who wish to know the truth take great pains and spare no expense to obtain it.

Young people often say that it is hard to become interested in reading the Scriptures. But if anyone reads them in order to find out what to do, and what to believe, he will, of necessity, find a deep interest in the study, as one finds a map interesting when he is planning a journey, or a chart when he is crossing the ocean.

God is no respecter of persons. Twice Africans are brought to our notice—here, and when Simon the Cyrenian helped Jesus to bear his cross. "As for the nationality of the Ethiopian," says Farrar, "it must be borne in mind that even Moses himself had once married an Ethiopian wife."

We can meet God and learn his will in the desert places of life, as Moses saw the burning bush, and Elijah heard the voice of God in the lonely places of Horeb, and Paul spent three years in the deserts of Arabia.

It is good to use every spare opportunity in studying and meditating on the Word of God. What we do with our spare moments often determines our characters even more than our daily labors do.

The books we choose and are familiar with, like our chosen friends, mold our characters and guide our destiny.

V. 29. "Then the Spirit said." The Spirit speaks not only to our feelings, but to our judgment and conscience. Whoever is perfectly willing to obey the voice of the Spirit will be guided aright. Prejudices, unwillingness to obey, past training or failure of training, in so far as we allow them to exert an influence, will lead us astray; as iron near the compass on a ship will deflect the guiding magnetic needle. "Join thyself to this chariot." An excellent illustration is found in "Pilgrim's Progress," where Christian is wandering around in doubt, and meeting Evangelist is directed to the right way.

V. 35. "Then Philip . . . began at the same Scripture." Which was fulfilled in Jesus, and has been fulfilled in no other. "And preached," announced the glad tidings of Jesus. Philip showed the strange and marvelous correspondence between the many descriptions of the Messiah in the prophets and the then well-known life of Jesus of Nazareth.

The Progress of a Soul Into the Kingdom. Compare with Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress as far as the Palace Beautiful, whence he was sent forth clothed in Christian armor.

1. He was deeply in earnest, and went on a long, dangerous, and costly journey to find the true religion.

2. He did this against many influences that held him back.

3. He went to the religious people and meetings where he thought he could learn about the true God and his service.

4. He read the Bible carefully to learn the way.

5. He was not discouraged because did not find the light.

6. He accepted the help of one knew the truth from experience.

7. As soon as he saw that Jesus was the true Saviour, he accepted him.

8. As soon as he felt he was a true disciple he desired to confess Christ by baptism, in the presence of his whole retinue. Confession strengthens the character and confirms the choice. Like Cortez, on landing on the Mexican shores, it burns the ships behind him. No better, no simpler, no more beautiful or expressive way of confessing Christ has ever been found, or even imagined, than that of baptism.

We shall enter into any war with a full consciousness of the awful consequences that it always entails, whether successful or not, and we, of course, shall make every effort, consistent with national honor and the highest national interest, to avoid a resort to arms. We favor every instrumentality, like that of The Hague tribunal and arbitration treaties made with a view to its use in all international controversies, in order to maintain peace and to avoid war. But we should be blind to existing conditions, and should allow ourselves to become foolish idealists, if we did not realize that with all the nations of the world armed and prepared for war, we must be ourselves in a similar condition, in order to prevent other nations from taking advantage of us and of our inability to defend our interests and assert our rights with a strong hand. In the international controversies that are likely to arise in the orient, growing out of the question of the open door and other issues, the United States can maintain her interests intact and can secure respect for her just demands. She will not be able to do so, however, if it is understood that she never intends to back up her assertion of right and her defense of her interest by anything but mere verbal protest and diplomatic note. For these reasons, the expenses of the army and navy and of coast defenses should always be considered as something which the government must pay for, and they should not be cut off through mere consideration of economy. Our government is able to afford a suitable army and a suitable navy. It may maintain them without the slightest danger to the republic or the cause of free institutions, and fear of additional taxation ought not to change a proper policy in this regard.

The policy of the United States in the Spanish war, and since, has given it a position of influence among the nations that it never had before, and should be constantly exerted to securing to its bona fide citizens, whether native or naturalized, respect for them as such in foreign countries. We should make every effort to prevent humiliating and degrading prohibition against any of our citizens wishing temporarily to sojourn in foreign countries, because of race or religion.

Sees Serious Defect in Present Federal Jurisdiction.

The admission of Asiatic immigrants who can not be amalgamated with our population has been made the subject either of prohibitory clauses in our treaties and statutes, or of strict administrative regulation secured by diplomatic negotiation. I sincerely hope that we may continue to minimize the evils likely to arise from such immigration without unnecessary friction and by mutual concessions between self-respecting governments. Meantime, we must take every precaution to prevent, or, failing that, to punish outbursts of race feeling among our people against foreigners of whatever nationality who have by our grant a treaty right to pursue lawful business here and to be protected against lawless assault or injury.

This leads me to point out a serious defect in the present federal jurisdiction which ought to be remedied at once. Having assured to other countries by treaty the protection of our laws for such of their subjects or citizens as we permit to come within our jurisdiction, we now leave to a state or a city, not under the control of the federal government, a duty of performing our international obligations in this respect. By proper legislation we may, and ought to, place in the hands of the federal executive the means of enforcing the treaty rights of such aliens in the courts of the federal government. It puts our government in a pusillanimous position to make definite engagements to protect aliens and then to excuse the failure to perform those engagements by an explanation that the duty to keep them is in states or cities, not within our control. If we would promise, we must put ourselves in a position to perform our promise. We cannot permit the possible failure of justice due to local prejudice in any state or municipal government to expose us to the risk of a war which might be avoided if federal jurisdiction was asserted by suitable legislation by congress and carried out by proper proceedings instituted by the executive in the courts of the national government.

Reforms Called for in Monetary and Banking Laws.

One of the reforms to be carried out during the incoming administration is a change of our monetary and banking laws, so as to secure greater elasticity in the forms of currency available for trade, and to prevent the limitations of law from operating to increase the embarrassments of a financial panic. The monetary commission lately appointed is giving full consideration to existing conditions and to all proposed remedies, and will doubtless suggest one that will meet the requirements of business and of public interest. We may hope that the report will embody neither the narrow view of those who believe that the sole purpose of the new system should be to secure a large return on banking capital or of those who would have greater expansion of currency with little regard to provisions for its immediate redemption or ultimate security. There is no subject of economic discussion so intricate and so likely to evoke differing views and dogmatic statements as this one. The commission in studying the general influence of currency on business and of business on currency, have wisely extended their investigation in European banking and monetary methods. The information that they have derived from such experts as they have found abroad will undoubtedly be found helpful in the solution of the difficult problem they have in hand.

Urges Prompt Passage of Postal Savings Bank Bill.

The incoming congress should promptly fulfill the promise of the Republican platform and pass a proper postal savings bank bill. It will not be unwise or excessive paternalism. The promise to repay by the government will furnish an inducement to savings deposits which private enterprise cannot supply, and at such a low rate of interest as not to withdraw custom from existing banks. It will substantially increase the funds available for investment as capital in useful enterprises. It will furnish the absolute security which makes the proposed scheme of government guaranty of deposits so alluring without its pernicious results.

I sincerely hope that the incoming congress will be alive, as it should be, to the importance of our foreign trade and of encouraging it in every way feasible. The possibility of increasing this trade in the orient, in the Philippines and in South America are known to everyone who has given the matter attention.

The importance which the department of agriculture and of commerce and labor may play in ridding the markets of Europe of prohibitions and discriminations against the importation of our products is fully understood, and it is hoped that the use of the maximum and minimum feature of our tariff law to be soon passed will be effective to remove many of those restrictions.

No Prospect of Failure in Building of Panama Canal.

The Panama canal will have a most important bearing upon the trade between the eastern and the far western sections of our country, and will greatly increase the facilities for transportation between the eastern and western seaboard, and may possibly revolutionize the transcontinental rates with respect to bulky merchandise. It will also have a most beneficial effect to increase the trade between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the western coast of South America, and, indeed, with some of the important ports on the east coast of South America reached by rail from the west coast. The work on the canal is making most satisfactory progress. The type of the canal as a lock canal was fixed by congress after a full consideration of the conflicting reports of the majority and minority of the consulting board, and after the recommendation of the war department and the executive upon those reports. Recent suggestion that something had occurred on the isthmus to make the lock type of the canal less feasible than it was supposed to be when the reports were made and the policy determined on, led to a visit to the isthmus of a board of competent engineers to examine the Gatun dam and locks which are the key of the lock type. The report of that board shows that nothing has occurred in the nature of newly revealed evidence which should change the views once formed in the original discussion. The construction will go on under a most effective organization controlled by Col. Goethals and his fellow army engineers associated with him, and will certainly be completed early in the next administration, if not before.

Some type of canal must be constructed. The lock type has been selected. We are all in favor of having it built as promptly as possible. We must not now, therefore, keep up a fire in the rear of the agents whom we have authorized to do our work on the isthmus. We must hold up their hands, and speaking for the incoming administration, I wish to say that I propose to devote all the energy possible and under my control, to the pushing of this work on the plans which have been adopted, and to stand behind the men who are doing faithful hard work to bring about the early completion of this, the greatest constructive enterprise of modern times.

The governments of our dependencies in Porto Rico and the Philippines are progressing as favorably as could be desired. The prosperity of Porto Rico continues unabated. The business conditions in the Philippines are not all that we could wish them to be, but with the passage of the new tariff bill permitting free trade between the United States and the archipelago, with such limitations in sugar and tobacco as shall prevent injury to the domestic interests on those products, we can count on an improvement in business conditions in the Philippines and the development of a mutually profitable trade between this country and the islands. Meantime our government in each dependency is upholding the traditions of civil liberty and increasing popular control which might be expected under American auspices. The work which we are doing there redounds to our credit as a nation.

Praise Accorded Progress Made by the Negro Race.

I look forward with hope to increasing the already good feeling between the south and the other sections of the country. My chief purpose is not to effect a change in the electoral vote of the southern states. That is a secondary consideration. What I look forward to is an increase in the tolerance of political views of all kinds and their advocacy throughout the south, and the existence of a respectable political opposition in every state; even more than this, to an increased feeling on the part of all the people in the south that this government is their government, and that its officers in their states are their officers.

The consideration of this question cannot, however, be complete and full without reference to the negro race, its progress and its present condition. The 13th amendment secured them freedom; the 14th amendment due process of law, protection of property and the pursuit of happiness; and the 15th amendment attempted to secure the negro against any deprivation of the priviliege to vote, because he was a negro. The 13th and 14th amendments have been generally enforced and have secured the objects for which they were intended. While the 15th amendment has not been generally observed in the past, it ought to be observed, and the tendency of southern legislation to-day is toward the enactment of electoral qualifications which shall square with that amendment. Of course, the mere adoption of a constitutional law is only one step in the right direction. It must be fairly and justly enforced as well. In time both will come. Hence it is clear to all that the domination of an ignorant, irresponsible element can be prevented by constitutional laws which shall exclude from voting both negroes and whites not having education or other qualifications thought to be necessary for a proper electorate. The danger of the control of an ignorant electorate has therefore passed. With this change, the interest which many of the southern white citizens take in the welfare of the negroes has increased. The colored man must base their hope on the results of their own industry, self-restraint, thrift and business success, as well as upon the aid and comfort and sympathy which they may receive from their white neighbors of the south. There was a time when northerners who sympathized with the negro in his necessary struggle for better conditions sought to give to him the suffrage as a protection, and to enforce its exercise against the prevailing sentiment of the south. The movement proved to be a failure. What remains is the 15th amendment to the constitution and the right to have statutes of states specifying qualifications for electors subjected to the test of compliance with that amendment. This is a great protection to the negro. It will never be repealed, and it never ought to be repealed. If it had not been passsed, it might be difficult now to adopt it; but with it in our fundamental law, the policy of southern legislation must and will tend to obey it, and so long as the statutes of the states meet the test of this amendment and are not otherwise in conflict with the constitution and laws of the United States it is not the disposition or within the province of the federal government to interfere with the regulation by southern states of their domestic affairs. There is in the south a stronger feeling than ever among the intelligent, well-to-do and influential element in favor of the industrial education of the negro and the encouragement of the race to make themselves useful members of the community. The progress which the negro has made in the last 50 years from slavery, when its statistics are reviewed, is marvelous, and it furnishes every reason to hope that in the next 25 years a still greater improvement in his condition as a productive member of society, on the farm, and in the shop and in other occupations, may come. The negroes are now Americans. Their ancestors came here years ago against their will, and this is their only country and their only flag. They have shown themselves anxious to live for it and willing to die for it. Encountering the race feeling against them, subjected at times to cruel injustice growing out of it, they may well have our profound sympathy and aid in the struggle they are making. We are charged with the sacred duty of making their path as smooth and easy as we can. Any recognition of their distinguished men, any appointment to office from among their number, is properly taken as an encouragement, and an appreciation of their progress, and this just policy shall be pursued.

Coming Era of Better Feeling Between Whites and Negroes.

But it may well admit of doubt whether, in the case of any race, an appointment of one of their number to a local office in a community in which the race feeling is so widespread and acute as to interfere with the ease and facility with which the local government business can be done by the appointee, is of sufficient benefit by way of encouragement to the race to outweigh the recurrence and increase of race feeling with such an appointment is likely to engender. Therefore, the executive, in recognizing the negro race by appointments, must exercise a careful discretion not thereby to do it more harm than good. On the other hand we must be careful not to encourage the mere pretense of race feeling manufactured in the interest of individual political ambition.

Personally I have not the slightest race prejudice or feeling, and recognition of its existence only awakens in my heart a deeper sympathy for those who have to bear it or suffer from it, and I question the wisdom of a policy which is likely to increase it. Meantime, if nothing is done to prevent, a better feeling between the negroes and the whites in the south will continue to grow, and more and more of the white people will come to realize that the future of the south is to be much benefited by the industrial and intellectual progress of the negro. The exercise of political franchises by those of his race who are intelligent and well-to-do will be acquiesced in, and the right to vote will be withheld only from the ignorant and irresponsible of both races.

Is Squarely in Favor of Proper Labor Legislation.

There is one other matter to which I shall refer. It was made the subject of great controversy during the election, and calls for at least a passing reference now. My distinguished predecessor has given much attention to the cause of labor, with whose struggle for better things he has shown the sincerest sympathy. At his instance, congress has passed the bill fixing the liability of interstate carriers to their employes for injury sustained in the course of employment, abolishing the rule of fellow-servant and the common law rule as to contributory negligence. It has also passed a law fixing the compensation of government employes for injuries sustained in the employ of the government through the negligence of the superior. It also passed a model child labor law for the District of Columbia. In previous administrations an arbitrary law for interstate commerce railroads and their employes, and laws for the application of safety devices to save the lives and limbs of employes of interstate railroads had been passed. Additional legislation of this kind was passed by the outgoing congress.

I wish to say that in so far as I can, I hope to promote the enactment of further legislation of this character.

Question of Injunctions in Industrial Disputes.

Another labor question has arisen which has awakened the most excited discussion. That is in respect to the power of the federal courts to issue injunctions in industrial disputes. As to that, my convictions are fixed. Take away from the courts, if it could be taken away, the power to issue injunctions in labor disputes, and it would create a privileged class among the laborers and save the lawless among their number from a most needful remedy available to all men for the protection of their business against lawless invasion. The proposition that business is not a property or pecuniary right which can be protected by equitable injunction is utterly without foundation in precedent or reason. The proposition is usually linked with one to make the secondary boycott lawful. Such a proposition is at variance with the American instinct and will find no support in my judgment when submitted to the American people. The secondary boycott is an instrument of tyranny, and ought not to be made legitimate.

The issuing of a temporary restraining order without notice has in several instances been abused by its inconsiderate exercise, and to remedy this, the platform upon which I was elected recommends the formulation in a statute of the conditions under which such a temporary restraining order ought to issue. A statute can and ought to be framed to embody the best modern practice, and can bring the subject so closely to the attention of the court as to make abuses of the process unlikely in the future. American people, if I understand them, insist that the authority of the courts shall be sustained and are opposed to any change in the procedure by which the powers of a court may be weakened and the fearless and effective administration of justice be interfered with.

Having thus reviewed the questions likely to recur during my administration, and having expressed in a summary way the position which I expect to take in recommendations to congress and in my conduct as an executive, I invoke the considerate sympathy and support of my fellow citizens, and the aid of Almighty God in the discharge of my responsible duties.

In the Millenium.

The probability is that, if there were a city composed of none but good men, it would be an object of competition to avoid the possession of power, just as now it is to obtain it; and then it would become clearly evident that it is not the nature of the genuine ruler to look to his own interest, but to those of his subject; so that every judicious man would choose to be a recipient of benefits, rather than to have the trouble of conferring them upon others.—Plato.

Sorry for the Lightkeeper.

While the dear old country gentleman and his wife were walking on the beach one evening they suddenly noticed the revolving light of a lightship. The old lady gazed at it with open eyes for some minutes, then she turned to her husband with a puzzled look. "Well," she exclaimed, "if the man in that ship hasn't lit that light this 40 times, and it has gone out everytime!"

Philip and the Ethiopian

Sunday School Lesson for March 7, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts. 8:26-38. Memory verses 29-31.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.—John 5:39.

TIME.—Summer of A. D. 36 or 37. So after the last lesson.

PLACE.—Where the road from Samaria to Gaza crosses or joins the road from Jerusalem to Gaza; in the uncultivated region southwest of Jerusalem, toward the old Philistine country.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

Vs. 27, 28. "A man of Ethiopia." A general term for the lands south of Egypt. But from the name of Queen Candace it was probably Meroe, a country which lay on the right ank of the Nile from its junction with the Atbara, as far as Khartoum, and thence to the east of the blue Nile to the Abyssinian mountains. "Of great authority." A man of power, of wide influence, a prince.

V. 28. "Was returning." Guided by Providence at exactly the right time. "Read" (was reading). "Esaias." Greek form of Isaiah. He was reading aloud as was the custom, so that Philip was able to hear it. It was a pleasant and profitable custom on long journeys.

Reading Aloud. "The great Jewish teachers insisted, in many instances, upon their scholars reading aloud." "I speak to the experience, probably, of many, when I say that utterance aloud is often a very powerful aid to mental retentiveness," says Joseph Parker. It is more than this, reading aloud helps us to understand the meaning of the Word. For in order to read well we must understand every shade of the meaning, or we will misinterpret God's Word. A monotonous, sing-song, woodeny, or artificial reading, such as we often hear, comes very near to being a crime, for it deprives the Word of its natural meaning, and makes the hearers inattentive, or repels them from the Word..

Those who wish to know the truth take great pains and spare no expense to obtain it.

Young people often say that it is hard to become interested in reading the Scriptures. But if anyone reads them in order to find out what to do, and what to believe, he will, of necessity, find a deep interest in the study, as one finds a map interesting when he is planning a journey, or a chart when he is crossing the ocean.

God is no respecter of persons. Twice Africans are brought to our notice—here, and when Simon the Cyrenian helped Jesus to bear his cross. "As for the nationality of the Ethiopian," says Farrar, "it must be borne in mind that even Moses himself had once married an Ethiopian wife."

We can meet God and learn his will in the desert places of life, as Moses saw the burning bush, and Elijah heard the voice of God in the lonely places of Horeb, and Paul spent three years in the deserts of Arabia.

It is good to use every spare opportunity in studying and meditating on the Word of God. What we do with our spare moments often determines our characters even more than our daily labors do.

The books we choose and are familiar with, like our chosen friends, mold our characters and guide our destiny.

V. 29. "Then the Spirit said." The Spirit speaks not only to our feelings, but to our judgment and conscience. Whoever is perfectly willing to obey the voice of the Spirit will be guided aright. Prejudices, unwillingness to obey, past training or failure of training, in so far as we allow them to exert an influence, will lead us astray; as iron near the compass on a ship will deflect the guiding magnetic needle. "Join thyself to this chariot." An excellent illustration is found in "Pilgrim's Progress," where Christian is wandering around in doubt, and meeting Evangelist is directed to the right way.

V. 35. "Then Philip . . . began at the same Scripture." Which was fulfilled in Jesus, and has been fulfilled in no other. "And preached," announced the glad tidings of Jesus. Philip showed the strange and marvelous correspondence between the many descriptions of the Messiah in the prophets and the then well-known life of Jesus of Nazareth.

The Progress of a Soul Into the Kingdom. Compare with Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress as far as the Palace Beautiful, whence he was sent forth clothed in Christian armor.

1. He was deeply in earnest, and went on a long, dangerous, and costly journey to find the true religion.

2. He did this against many influences that held him back.

3. He went to the religious people and meetings where he thought he could learn about the true God and his service.

4. He read the Bible carefully to learn the way.

5. He was not discouraged because he did not find the light.

6. He accepted the help of one who knew the truth from experience.

7. As soon as he saw that Jesus was the true Saviour, he accepted him.

8. As soon as he felt he was a true disciple he desired to confess Christ by baptism, in the presence of his whole retinue. Confession strengthens the character and confirms the choice. Like Cortez, on landing on the Mexican shores, it burns the ships behind him. No better, no simpler, no more beautiful or expressive way of confessing Christ has ever been found, or even imagined, than that of baptism.

Down the River.

By FRANK H. WILLIAMS.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Ralph Curtis, sitting at the telephone, smiled as he listened to the words coming to him through the receiver.

"I'm angry—very, very angry," said a voice—a sweet, womanly, young voice. "You never should have allowed your cattle to trespass on my grounds. I don't think I shall ever speak to you again."

"But it really wasn't my fault, Clare," cried Ralph. "How was I to know that my cattle were trespassing? All my men have been busy during the day trying to save things from this high water. I'm sure, dear, that if I'd known what the beasts were doing I'd have shot them."

"Too late," came the answer in rather cold tones. "My garden is utterly ruined and guests coming tomorrow

GRADUALLY THEY CAME INTO SHALLOWER WATER.

Don't call me 'dear' any more. After this please call me Miss Wellman. I shall never speak to you again. Goodby."

Ralph started to speak, but the party at the other end of the line had rung off.

"Hum," he mused, scratching his head in perplexity. "She'll never speak to me again, but I'm to call her Miss Wellman hereafter. Rather inconsistent, to say the least. I wonder who her guests are. I wonder if the other fellow— Well, well, maybe he is coming, but he'll have to hurry if he expects to reach the Wellman home without getting his feet wet."

Ralph thrust his hands deep into his pockets and strolled to the window overlooking the river which flowed between his home and Miss Wellman's. Through the gusty rain he could make out the surging stream, swollen till it nearly reached the top of the banks.

Dark, discolored, filled with branches of trees and other light material caught in its flood, the river raced sullenly onward like an unclean thing.

"It's going to rise a lot more before it goes down," he muttered.

From the river his glance sought the distant shore. Dimly he could discern pale lights through the gloom.

"Gee!" Ralph cried suddenly as he realized how much the river had risen in the past hour. "If it comes up much farther it will go hard with Clare over there."

He strode to the telephone. As he placed the receiver to his ear he caught a sharp crack and rending sound; then the wire went dead. He was cut off from communication with the outside world and with Clare.

Again Ralph strode to the window. As he looked down at the angry water it seemed to him that the river had risen materially in the moment that he had been at the phone.

The thought galvanized him into sudden action. He jumped from the window and tore out of the room into the pelting rain toward his automobile shed.

Here he quickly stripped his huge car of its gigantic searchlight and gas tank and with the apparatus rushed back to the room. In a moment he had the gas turned on, and a flood of light poured through the lens.

With care he raised the window and projected the light through the opening toward the opposite shore. The powerful light cleaved a way through the dark and rain, showing in outlines clear enough for his vision the opposite shore.

Ralph gasped at what he saw. The water was at the second story of the Wellman home. He had not before realized how much lower the Wellman home was than his. Some one came to the window directly opposite the Curtis home.

Ralph strained his eyes. Surely it was Clare and alone. Where were the others? Then he remembered that Clare's father and mother had left that morning for town and had undoubtedly been prevented from returning by the flood.

Ralph advanced to the window and waved his arms reassuringly to the girl. She responded. Quickly he turned off the light. Gathering up the apparatus in his arms, he hurried from the room out into the rain again and to the boathouse.

The frail little launch had been taken from the house when the river began to rise and moored alongside it. Now the house was wholly under water, and Ralph was forced to swim to the boat, holding the searchlight as well as he could.

In the boat he started first the light and then the engine and put out into the swollen stream. The little craft was sadly buffeted by the sticks and the waves and time and again shipped water as Ralph sturdily headed for the opposite shore.

The searchlight disclosed the Wellman home with the water now a little above the second story. In the window stood the girl, waving her hands encouragingly.

At length Ralph managed to catch hold of the window. Inside the room the girl stood nearly waist deep in the water.

"Quick!" cried Ralph. "Get into the boat!"

Silently the girl obeyed. Just as she was safely seated Ralph's grasp was broken. The water dashed them furiously away and then against the house. Something snapped. With a muttered ejaculation Ralph looked to his engine. Nothing seemed to be amiss, and he threw the throttle forward. The engine raced terrifically, and he quickly jerked the throttle back.

"The propeller shaft is broken," he announced in a voice that strove to be calm. "We'll have to float down with the current and try to land somewhere."

The girl was startled, but also tried to appear unconcerned.

"That's too bad," she said, with a little catch in her voice. "I was never, never going to talk to you again, but I suppose I'll have to now."

"Oh, I'll not force you to!" growled Ralph as he puttered over the machine.

"Do you know," went on the girl, "I think your horrid old cows are the cause of all this? It was only after they trampled over my garden that the river came up. I know I can never forgive them."

"And incidentally never forgive me, I suppose," mumbled the man.

The girl said nothing. Then suddenly she lifted up her feet with an expression of dismay.

"Gracious, the boat's full of water!" she cried. "I'm so wet, anyway, that I didn't notice it before."

"Yep," replied the man shortly. "She's sprung a leak. We've got to make a landing, sure."

With the powerful searchlight, which still burned undimmed, he swept the waters.

"Look!" he cried. "If those aren't cattle I'll eat my hat!"

Ahead of them the light revealed some three or four heads rising out of the water and steadily moving from the center of the stream.

"They're walking!" cried Ralph. "They can take us ashore!"

He sprang to the steering wheel and skillfully maneuvered the boat so that it passed near the beasts. The girl saw his intention, and as they passed both jumped, landing safe on the sturdy animals.

Almost undisturbed and unswayed by the rushing waters, the cattle plowed steadily onward. Gradually they came into shallower water, and thankfully Ralph and the girl slid from the beasts' backs. Hand in hand they struggled along now, faster than the cattle. Ralph cast one last look back at the beasts and gasped.

"Why, they're mine!" he cried. That's Bess, and there's Doll! Why, Clare, dear, do you realize that the cattle you thought had caused it all have saved us?"

"Oh!" cried the girl and turned to him.

"And look there!" cried Ralph, pointing ahead. "See what they've brought us to. See; that's the Rev. Sturgis' home on the road to your house, and look there—he's opening the door. Look, look, dear, your father and mother are with him!"

The girl looked, and then, sobbing piteously, she threw her arms around Ralph's neck.

"Oh, dear, dear!" she cried. "I forgive your cows, I forgive you, and," she added ungrammatically, but soulfully, as she clung to Ralph and he held her close, "I'm never not going to speak to you again!"

What the Bridegroom Resents.

"Even the English language emphasizes the insignificance of a man at his own wedding," said the prospective bridegroom disconsolately. "There isn't an independent word to designate him. He is merely called the groom of the bride, as if he were just about on a level with the bridesmaids and a little below the maid of honor. Best man, of course, means the bridegroom's best man, but the phrase itself tends to exalt this individual at the expense of his superior.

"Then there's no adjective to describe what pertains to the male half of the affair. You can't speak of the 'bridegromal' trousers or necktie. On the other hand, 'bridal' applies not only to the possessions of the girl, but to what relates to both of them equally, like the trip and the bridal chamber. The very words 'matrimony' and 'matrimonial' are from the feminine side only. 'Patrimony' has nothing to do with the nuptials. It applies only to wealth and signifies that a man's part in the affair is to get out and hustle for the cash."—New York Times.

Merely Tentative.

"What is the baby's name?"

"It's Mary now, but I suppose it will be Mayme or Mae or Marie as soon as she gets old enough to notice it."—Chicago Tribune.

NO HARD FEELINGS.

Was Even Willing to Pay Half the Repair Bill.

COMING to a sudden stop, the driver of the automobile jumps out of his machine and runs back to where his victims lie upon the ground. But one of them is alive, and he is seriously hurt.

"I'm profoundly sorry this happened," says the man from the automobile, "but it was an accident I could not avoid. I am deeply sorry, and I hope you will allow me to settle whatever damages there are and that you will not feel harshly toward me."

"It's all right, friend," sighs the surviving victim. "That other man was my rich uncle, and I am his only heir, and, besides, I have been carrying a $100 a week accident policy for ten years. This is the first time I could ever get action on it. If your machine is broken I'll pay half the repair bill."—Judge.

Changed His Mind.

"What is in that big package?" asks Mrs. Claus while old Santa is loading up his sleigh.

"That's a lot of dolls and trinkets for Mr. Growleigh's house."

"Mr. Growleigh? Why, isn't he the man who has always argued that Christmas was a nonsensical, extravagant idea and who has headed a crusade to abolish the giving of useless things?"

"Yes, he was. But they've got a baby at his house now."—Chicago Post.

How It Would Tempt Him.

"See you fat fowl," whispered the tall tramp at the water tank. "Wouldst thou enjoy him?"

Friends.

Trouble is a friend of mine—
When it came with me to stay
Such a host of kindly friends
Trouble brought to make amends
That they crowded it away,
Trouble is a friend of mine.

And another friend is pain—
Pain, almost forgotten now,
Brought the gentle, thrilling touch
Of the hands I love so much,
Tenderly to soothe my brow—
Yes, a friend of mine is pain.

Yet I have a better friend—
'Twas a better let me know,
More than kindness or caress,
What exhaustless tenderness
From a heart could overflow—
Sorrow is my dearest friend.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1909.

Republican Municipal Convention

The Republican voters of the town of Oakland are requested to assembled at the furniture store of Mr. D. E. Bolden on Second street, this

Thursday Evening,
March 4, at 7.30 O'clock,

for the purpose of nominating three candidates for the office of Town Councilmen to serve for a term of two years.

Let all attend.

A. G. STURGISS,
Chairman County Committee.

WASHINGTON has five inches of snow today, but notwithstanding this the inauguration of President Taft came off on schedule time. His inaugural address will be found on page one of THE REPUBLICAN.

A GLANCE BACK.

With the retirement of President Roosevelt from office, a synopsis of the most important accomplishments of the administration during the past seven years may be pertinent, and we present them here without giving any post of honor to any one achievement:

The navy of the United States has been more than doubled; it has now done what no other similar fleet of like size ever did—viz., circumnavigated the globe; and it is also in far more efficient battle trim than when it started out a year ago.

No feat of quite such far-reaching importance has been to the credit of this country in recent years as the Panama Canal.

The peace of Portsmouth was a substantial achievement, as was also the part played by the United States in the Algeciras Conference.

The settlemont of the anthracite strike was a matter of very real moment to the American people from the standpoint not only of industrial but of social reform and progress.

The forest reserve of the country have been trebled or quadrupled; the forest service has been reorganized and placed under the Department of Agriculture; and there have been created a number of reservations for preserving the wild things of nature—the birds and beasts as well as the trees.

In the matter of legislation, the national irrigation act, which is resulting in the development of the semi-arid states of the great plains and the Rockies is an achievement second only in importance to the creation of the homestead act itself.

The administration of the civil government in the Philippine Islands has been put upon a satisfactory basis. Because of American interference in Cuba the island is now in a thriving and prosperous condition, and is on the road to stable and orderly independence. The treaty with Santo Domingo has put the affairs of the island on a better basis than they have ever been before. The position of the United States in reference to the Latin-American Republics is definitely better than it has ever been before; as is also the case with Japan.

A law has been passed improving the administration of the Army and of the national guard. The law establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor with the Bureau of Corporations enabled this country to take the first really efficient step toward exercising proper national supervision and control over the great corporations.

The consular service of the United States has been completely reorganized, a law has been enacted giving vitality to the Interstate Commerce Commission and for the first time providing some kind of efficient control by the national government over the great railroads. A law has been passed providing for federal meat inspection and inspection of the packing houses, also a pure food bill, both of them of the utmost importance in the sanitary standpoint.

In the matters of social and industrial reform a law has been enacted creating a Juvenile Court for the District of Columbia; another providing for the investigation of the condition of women and child workers of the United States; an employers' liability law for corporations engaged in interstate commerce, for the government itself and for the District of Columbia, where child labor has also been regulated by law.

The Alaska boundary dispute has been settled. The Pacific cable has been laid. The establishment of the Army and Navy maneuvers has much increased the efficiency of the Army and doubled the efficiency of the Navy. A movement has been started for the development of the Inland Waterways as a part of the great movement for the conservation of the natural resources of the country. A movement is under way for the betterment of the conditions of country life. Big corporations and labor unions have been impartially brought before the courts and the most powerful wrongdoers in the land have been brought to justice and been punished by fine and imprisonment. Many successful suits, civil and criminal, have been undertaken by the government.

ROAD IMPROVEMENT PROBLEM.

Before it is through with the difficulties incident to the selection of routes for the so-called State roads to be improved under the bill appropriating $5,000,000 for this purpose passed by the legislature at its last session, the Good Roads Commission finds itself up against other questions of a vexing character. One of these questions, raised at a meeting of Montgomery county farmers held at Sandy Spring on Tuesday, is whether existing stone roads which are part of route selected by the commission shall be torn up; that is, whether money shall be spent upon the reconstruction or these roads, or whether they shall be left practically in the condition in which they are found and the money which it would take to reconstruct them be spent upon the improvement of roads not now macadamized, or the purchase, and freeing from tollgates, of more miles of turnpike. It developed at the Sandy Spring meeting that here is a division of opinion on this point in the Good Roads Commission. Two members of the commission were present at the meeting, one of whom declared that he was opposed to the uprooting and reconstructing of the turnpikes, but favored their gradual improvement, while the other declared that he was of the opinion that the old stone roads should be torn up, and that he would not be converted to any other view. This is a question which the Good Roads Commission may well hesitate in deciding. There is some thing to be said on each side of it. If the question were put up to the people, however, it is probable that a majority would vote in favor of eliminating the tollgates as quickly as possible, and afterwards improving the the turnpikes and macadamizing dirt roads, as rapidly as the State can afford to do it.

EQUIPMENT FOR AN ARMY OF 750.000 MEN.

That the United States Government could arm 750,000 soldiers, if they should be called into the field, with the stock of modern rifles it now has on hand is the gratifying information which the army officers have given to the Congressional committees. A few years ago the problem of arming a great force would have been well-nigh insoluble. The country couldn't have secured the guns for love nor money simply because they were not in the country. The Government arsenals were set to work turning out a great stock of them, and the result is the very satisfactory showing now made.

This is another aspect of preparation in which great progress has been made since the Spanish War. It is now well known that when the conflict broke out there would have been genuine panic if the country had been permitted to know how ill-prepared we were for a fight. Not only is there now an ample supply of weapons for any force which it is conceivable the country may need to call into action, but these weapons are all of better type than those used during the Spanish War. The old Springfield was then used, and it did good service. The new Springfield, however, has been developed into a vastly superior weapon, the experience of the Manchurian War having given some useful pointers on rifle construction, especially with reference to the construction and use of the bayonet.

In the direction of artillery, it also develops, the United States is better prepared than for many years past—in fact, better than ever before since the Civil War. A hundred batteries of three-inch field pieces are now available, and they are of the best style. Everything provided for the army and navy nowadays is of the best. Time was when this rule did not obtain. It is not unlikely that the time will come when the lesson of the Spanish War, with its reminder that military matters must not always be neglected, will be looked upon as the country's salvation from a great disaster. But for that war we would doubtless have gone on indefinitely in ways of careless unpreparedness.

COUNTIES SHOULD BE WARY.

While Baltimore City has inaugurated a campaign for largely increased representation in the Senate and House of Delegates of the General Assembly of the State, the advocates of the project are waking up to the knowledge that better quality in its representatives is at least as fully desirable as an increase in their numbers. Leading citizens in the learned professions and in the various branches of business enterprise are being importuned to become candidates and a few of them have indicated a willingness to make the sacrifice. Political bosses, however, may not see things in that light. They want henchmen who will be subject to their control in their legislative acts and not citizens of independent character who will vote as they please upon such measures as may call for their action in the legislature. It is to be feared that enlarged representation would only increase the influence and authority of the bosses in shaping legislation and for that reason, if for no other, the people of the State should be wary in the consideration of the project to greatly enlarge the city's power in the legislature. The effort to induce citizens of a better class that has been representing the city to assume legislative responsibility will likely by only spasmodic and ephemeral. Little hope can be cherished of permanent and lasting improvement in existing conditions and with the numbers of the city's senators and delegates augmented the more politicians, relegated to the rear for a season, would return to their own again with their authority enlarged to the extent of such increase.

It may not be just to the city to refuse any addition what ever to its representation but it should not go beyond the creation of five legislative districts with a senator and six delegates for each. The counties have shown by their past action on several occasions that they are in no respect hostile to the city or inimical to her interests. Under the constitution of 1851 she had a single senator and only ten delegates. The constitution of 1864 increased her representation to three senators and eighteen delegates. Twelve or fifteen years ago an amendment to the constitution adopted by a large majority added another senator and six delegates to that number. Considering the political—not partisan—conditions which have generally prevailed in the metropolis of the State to add more than another senator and six delegates to her representation would be to cross the danger line for the counties.

WAR AGAINST DISEASE.

One of the worthiest of charities is that established by the wife of a New York man of wealth, who has donated $1,000,000 for four model tenements intended to house persons suffering from tuberculosis.

Had such charities as this been universally undertaken several years ago, tuberculosis would not have made the gains it has and the country would not now be confronted with one of the greatest wars against disease on record. We have failed to provide our working classes with proper habitations Better housing conditions, sanitary factories, plenty of fresh air and sunshine, these are the factors that combine to make the battle against the Great White Plague easier to win.

These conditions, for the present at least, will probably have to be supplied by persons such as the New York woman referred to. But the campaign of education can go on unchecked, and it will doubtless serve to accomplish as much as, if not more than, large monetary donations.

BLOOMINGTON.

William Paugh, who made his home with his son, Mr. John Paugh, of Mt. Zion, died at the advanced age of 96 years, on February 23rd. His remains were interred in the family grave yard of William Beavers on Thursday. Mr. Paugh was the father of seven children, and a pioneer settler of the Mt. Zion community, in which he had lived during his entire life time.

The remains of Mrs. Edward Tasker, of Antioch, were brought to Cross on last Tuesday to be buried in the Clayton grave yard. Mrs. Tasker was the youngest daughter of the late James Tasker and leaves a family of four children.

Mr. N. U. Bond, of Bond, is visiting his aged father at Brockwayville, Pa.

Mr. John Miller, the Luke merchant, was in town on business on Wednesday.

It is said that after many weary years of patient waiting the traveling public over the W. M. R. R. will be rewarded for the suffering it has endowed to mind and body from delayed trains and inclement weather, by the erection of a a waitng shed, to be called a depot at Franklin.

Our old friend and fellow citizen, Mr. Otho Barnard, went away up to Swanton and back again Monday.

Mr. "Coon" Mitter has a smile on his face as bright as the noonday sun—it is the thirteenth child and a big bouncing boy—"Bully for Coon." May he live long and keep on prospering.

Mr. Malcolm Macfarland, of Towanda, Pa., who has been spending a few days with his brother, Mr. George C. Macfarland, of Barnum, W. Va., left on Monday on a business trip up the Dry Fork R. R.

Miss Alma Kemp, who has been on an extended visit to friends in Brownsville, Pittsburg and Brockwayville, Pa., returned home Tuesday.

School Notes.

J. C. Renninger, Esq., has presented a dictionary holder to the school library.

County Superintendent Ed. Browning spent Tuesday morning visiting the High School.

It is reported that Hon. Philip Willett, of Mt. Lake Park, will deliver the commencement address.

Hon. Clayton Purnell, a member of the State Board of Education, will deliver an address to the schools on Maryland Day, March 25, to which the patrons are cordially invited.

A TYPHOID FEVER EPIDEMIC AT BOND

Eight Cases Sent to Hospital in Cumberland and One Death Resulted.

An epidemic of typhoid fever in its worst form has broken out at the lumbertng town of Bond, this county, resulting in nine cases already developed with one death resulting, the victim of the disease being Floyd Swauger, a youth of twelve years, who died last Thursday.

Telephone advices from Bond to THE REPUBLICAN last night stated that the eight patients had been removed to the Cumberland hospital, three being taken there on Friday and five on Saturday. Of the cases taken to Cumberland Saturday four out of one family, named Schreckengest, were suffering with the disease. The physician attending the patients is of the opinion that two additional cases were developing last night, but of this he was not positive.

To what the outbreak of the disease can be attributed cannot be learned. The water supply is obtained from springs in the mountain and is considered pure water.

SWANTON.

Will you squeeze out space sufficient in which to state as a news item from Swanton, that Washington's birthday has again dawned and closed? In banquet hall, "we have heard people say," it is the custom to drink the toast to the dead standing in silence; possibly a similar delicacy was meant in Swanton to so illustrious a memory—a silence "too deep for sound and foam."

It is by no means the least of the countless encomiums eloquently lavished upon Washington that through the renown of so many chiefs and statesmen following in more than a century his name should continue to shine in such steady and unabated brilliancy. From father to son an incident has been kept from oblivion to which Henry Clay lent distinction. A circle of gentlemen in which the famous Commoner of the West was the central figure were conversing with Washington as the inspiring topic. Allusion was made to a tradition lurking through the ages in which the Father of his country is less faultless than regarded by posterity, and Mr. Clay was asked for an opinion. At the moment the matchless orator was pacing the floor under the heat of aroused feeling, but quickly paused with an up lifted hand of depreciation exclaimed: "Ah sir, General Washington was so good and great a man that no tradition to his disparagement should be either remembered or repeated!"

Your readers will be more than glad to hear that Swanton's postmaster, Mr. William W. Sweet, is upon the road to recovery from his protracted and prostrating illness.

Mr. Joseph F. Friend, reduced in health by advanced age, suffered last week a slight attack of paralysis, involving the left arm and remotely the left side.

Mr. Millard Beightol, while on a visit to friends in Rowlesburg, has been sick and under the care of physicians but is now convalescent.

The better leaven of Swanton's being is finding rescue we trust from jeopardy in a religious revival bar into its second week under the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Johnson and the Rev. Mr. Stoneking, both of the U. B. church.

Can you produce in your columns for the benefit Garrett a recipe, handy for application, for bringing boys of unsavory ways to their place in the public schools? If you can then speak in no uncertain tones. In this school district is a school above the average in capability and administrative quality, but go at any time to the railroad platform and there will be found groups of idle boys, puffing at the discarded stumps of pernicious "stogies," catching at passing trains, indulging in debasing language and acquiring their first lessons culminating in criminal action in courts. All these boys need is a wholeseme authority prudentiy administered from the home or from some directing hand requiring them to do that the vital importance of which they will not be able to understand until too late for their benefit.

Why not advocate for Garrett a strict legislative enactment for a compulsory attendance in the Public Schools?

Inspection of the Betrothed.

In Moscow every 17th of May they celebrate a holiday called the "Inspection of the Betrothed." Young men who wish to marry are drawn up in a row on the sidewalk and for five or six hours enjoy the privilege of "sizing up," as we would express it, the procession of petticoated divinities of the city. The young women are decorated in their finest raiment, brilliant with their natural graces, and ornamented with gems and flowers. The following day proposals are made to the parents of such as have attracted the notice of the men.

BITTINGER.

A visitor from a nearby town, while in conversation with a thrifty farmer, said: "Your village is certainly remarkable for its fresh air, and I believe Bittinger is the windiest place in the county." The farmer, who had a high regard for the merits of his native community, replied; "I can hardly agree with you, sir. I was over in your town the other day and I heard some tall blowing that would have made a Texas cowboy turn green with envy, and almost everybody know that your town is noted for "hot air."

Simon Beachy and Miss Katie Bender were quietly married at the home of the bride's brother, near this village, on last Sunday afternoon, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Gideon Miller, of the Mennonite church. The young people are natives of this neighborhood and the congratulations and well wishes of all their friends and acquaintances are extended to the happy couple, who, we hope, will locate permanently in this section.

A. J. Oester attended the funeral of his aged mother, which occurred at Cove, on last Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. Tarlton Collier, of Cove, were in this village on business last week.

A remarkably heavy run of sugar water was gathered in the various sugar camps in this neighborhood last week, but a change in weather conditions has put a stop to that industry for the present.

G. N. Emory, of Friendsville, was visiting his son at this place last Sunday.

Ross Durst was a pleasant caller in this village Sunday afternoon.

F. M. Bittinger is arranging for the purchase of a shingle mill which he will put into operation at his coal mine near here and will be glad to do shingle sawing for his neighbors.

A RemarKable Colored Woman.

Mrs. Sarah Ann McClough, a well to do colored woman, died at her home near Paw Paw, W. Va., at the wonderful age of 104 years. She was born on the farm owned by her father, John Robinson, near Middletown, Va., about 1805. She had a wonderful memory, having but recently recalled seeing the stars fall on Nov. 13, 1833, and many other things that occured many years ago. Her father being a free-holder, she was never a slave and by this advantage she had accumulated enough to purchase her farm of 300 acres on which is an immense peach orchard and a comfortable dwelling where she and her only son lived in comfort till death claimed her, she being up and active until two days before. A remarkable thing about her was that she could read, knit or sew without the use of spectacles with as much ease as a person of 30 years. She was an aunt of Mrs. Harriet Banks, of Oakland, who attended her funeral. She leaves quite a number of grandchildren and other near relatives.

DEATH RECORD.

CLARENCE M. RATHBUN.

Clarence M. Rathbun, senior member of the firm of C. M. Rathbun & Sons, planing mill owners and operators, died at his residence at Mountain Lake Park, Sunday midnight, his death being sudden and unexpected. For many years past Mr. Rathbun had been a great sufferer from bronchial asthma, his death being ultimately caused by the effects of this disease. Mr. Rathbun was a native of Pittsburg, Pa., where he was born in the year 1849, being a son of Erasmus and Alice Ward-Rathbun, the father, whose age is past eighty, still survives, and has made his home for many years with the family of the recently deceased. Shortly after the birth of Mr. Rathbun his father moved with the family to Wheeling where he was raised and educated in the public schools of that city. At the age of 12 years he entered the employ of his father in a planing mill owned by him and there mastered the details of the business. In 1886 he came to this section from Wheeling and took charge of the planing mill at Mountain Lake Park which he managed for the owners until 1891, when he returned to Wheeling. The following fall, however, he returned to the Park and purchased the property and later associated with himself in the business his two sons, Messrs. Joseph and Warren. From the beginning he was eminently successful in business and amassed considerable property. As a man he was a representative citizen in all that tended toward the good of his fellow citizens and his family; was a devout Christian and by both example and precept practiced the golden rule. In 1870 Mr. Rathbun married Miss Mary Virgin, daughter of John Virgin, of Green county, Pa. To this union were born five sons, Clarence, Warren, Frank, Edward and William, All, with the exception of Edward, survive the father. Mr. Rathbun was a life-long, consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church in which organization he was a class leader for a number of years. He was also a member of Oakland Lodge No. 192, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, a Past Grand of Virginius Lodge No. 2, I. O. O. F., of Wheeling, and a member of Oakland Lodge Knights of Pythias. His funeral took place Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock from his late home where a short service was conducted by Rev. J. O. Bolton, of the Mountain Lake Park M. E. church, after which the Masonic Fraternity took charge of the remains and with the impressive funeral ceremonies of that organization interred the remains in the Oakland cemetery in the presence of a large number of friends who had gathered to pay a last tribute to the memory of one who was held in high esteem for his many noble qualities and his consistent Christian life.

A correspondent to the Oakland Journal recently had an item concerning "Elizabeth" Livengood, the Sugar King. Now, wouldn't Elizabeth be a deuce of a name for a king? The person meant was evidently Elijah Livengood, but the Journal is very apt to get things twisted ever since it published Dan Dorsey's political hog wash and tried to palm it off on its readers for Republican correspondence assailing President-elect Taft's religion.—Elk Lick Star.

Dr. Henry W. McComas returned from Washington Snuday morning, having been engaged in that city for two or three weeks completing arrangements for the manufacture of a collapsible crate which he recently invented and which promises to revolutionize the crate business, the new crate meeting all the claims made for it by the inventor and will without doubt meet the requirements made upon it by shippers and others using packing boxes.

Mr. J. J. Brenneman, of Accident, was in the city Saturday and called at this office on business. Within two weeks Mr. Brenneman, accompanied by his wife, will leave for Kalona, Iowa, where he may permanently reside. Mr Brennneman's removal from his native county will be regretted by all who know him. He is a member of one of the oldest resident families of the county, being a son of the late John Brenneman, of Accident, whose death occurred about seven years ago, well remembered and much loved by his hosts of friends.

Another mock marriage in socially prominent circles has gotten in much undesirable notoriety. This is a matter which legislation would probably be inadequate to meet, but it is one where the native good sense of the people should interfere. The idiot who proposes such a scheme, the fools who carry it through, are perhaps too hopelessly wanting in rudimentary common sense or in a decent appreciation for the most serious responsibility that can come into the life of any human being to be reformed, but the fool-killer may be promptly sent for and those requiring his attentions shut up by themselves in some convenient killing pen until his arrival. A person who suggests a mock marriage may be set down as either a scroundrel or an imbecile. Let him take his choice, but let him be cast out from among decent people.

Married.

NELSON—GRINDLE—Mr. Thomas Thompson Nelson, formerly of Oakland, and Miss Minnie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Hubert Grindle, of Frostburg, Allegany county, were married at the home of the bride's parents last Wednesday evening at seven o'clock by Rev. A. H. Thompson, pastor of the First M. E. church, in the presence of the members of the immediate families of the contracting parties. The bride is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Grindle and is one of Frostburg's most charming young ladies. Mr. Nelson has for a number of years been the traveling representative through this section for Armour & Co., meat packers. After the wedding ceremony a delightful collation was served and the couple departed for Pittsburg, where the honeymoon will oe spent. They will reside in Frostburg.

S. H. Jackson, C. T. Kelley, Will Lakin, J. S. Lakin, S. M. Scott, C. M. Crane, F. E. Brenneman and Oscar Hinebaugh walked to Oakland Sunday afternoon on the railroad track in two hours and thirteen minutes. The distance is ten miles. C. A. Miller, who was with the party that walked to Rowlesburg a week ago Sunday, did not take the Oakland trip. Terra Alta pedestrians declare that walking ten miles in the time made Sunday is a feat that not everyone can achieve. It was really going some.—Terra Alta Republican.

Mr. Louis Killius, of near Sunnyside, who recently took the examination prescribed by the post office department for rural route carriers, was successful in passing and on Monday took charge of Route No. 2 out of Oakland, relieving Mr. M. M. Ashby, who has been substitute carrier on the route since the resignation of George W. Fulmer early in the summer. Mr. Ashby's service has been eminently satisfactory to the patrons of the route and he would have been appointed to serve as regular carrier except for the ruling of the department prohibiting those above a certain age limit serving as such.

An employe of the Index, who during the past four years has worked on the making of catalogues for the city mail order houses, is authority for the statement that there has been a systematic and steady increase in the prices of articles each year. This, he says, is made possible by the patrons of mail order houses "getting the habit," and they keep on blindly, never noticing the advance. Get down your old catalogues and compare the prices with those in this year's catalogue, and see yourself whether or not this is true. If it is, ponder. Maybe you are being "skun" and don't know it.—Mt. Morris Index.

The semi-annual meeting of the Women's Baptist State Mission Society of Maryland was held recently in the Franklin Square Baptist church in Baltimore, and Mrs. George W. Haulenbeek made the principal address. The audience gave Mrs. Haulenbeek's remarks close attention and she was congratulated by Mrs. George H. Eyster, the president of the society, who presided. Mrs. Gault, who spends the summers at Mt. Lake Park, was also present. The pastor of the Fulton Avenue Baptist church also made an address which was replete with information pertaining to the topic of the day. Mrs. Haulenbeek is now at her home at Deer Park, having come up from Baltimore on train No. 3 last Sunday morning. While in the East she also visited in Philadelphia and Washington.

In the "wet" counties of South Carolina a special election is to be held in August next on the issue of local option. In order to increase the probability that the "wet" counties will adhere to their present system of irrigation the legislative act provides that in these counties there is to be absolute prohibition for fourteen days before the election. This looks as if the idea of "trial marriages" had been adopted, and trial prohibition is to exist for a fortnight before public opinion thereon shall be registered. Persons of bibulous proclivities will acquire such a thirst during the fourteen days of aridity that their attack upon the ballot box will be something terrible. It will be idle for them to go across the county line during this closed season, because all the counties in which the election is not to be held are already "dry." August is a very hot month, and there will be terrible suffering in the Palmetto State from the 4th to the 17th both included.

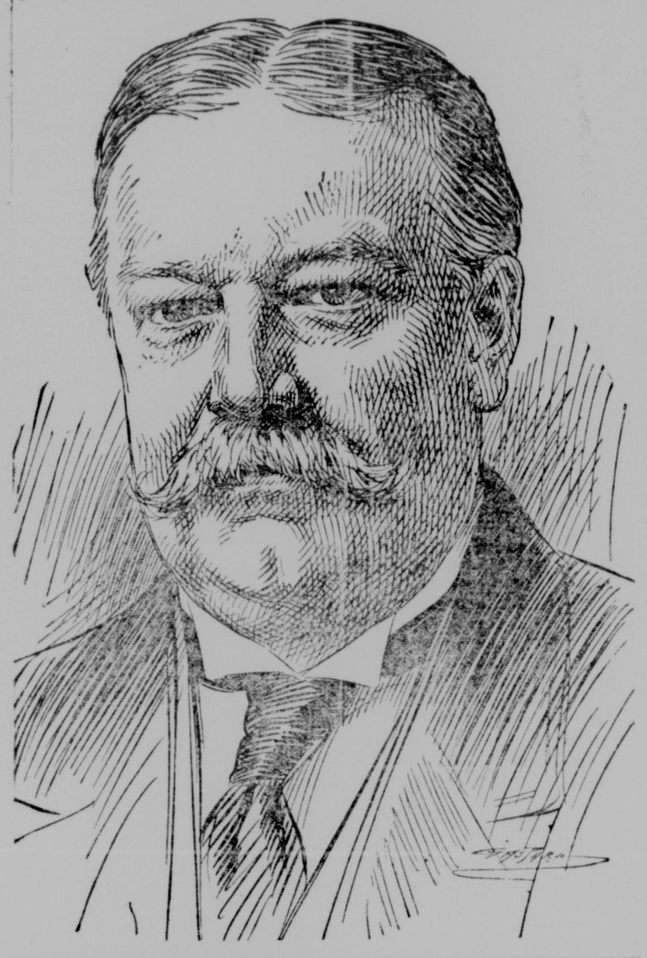
PRESIDENT WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT



TAFT AND SHERMAN ARE INAUGURATED

NEW PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT TAKE OATH OF OFFICE.

WASHINGTON IS THRONGED

Details of the Notable Ceremonies in the Senate Chamber and on the East Portico of the Capitol.

BY EDWARD B. CLARK.

Washington, Mar. 4.—William Howard Taft is now president of the United States and James Schoolcraft Sherman is vice-president.

President Taft took the oath of office shortly after noon on the east portico of the capitol in the presence of one of the greatest throngs that ever gathered in the chief legislative city of the nation to witness the ceremonies attending the inauguration of a chief executive. The vice-president took the oath of office in the senate chamber immediately preceding the administering of the oath to the president-elect.

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Taft has been in civil pursuits all his life, the military display which accompanied his induction into office was greater than that which marked the inauguration of the militant rough rider president, Theodore Roosevelt, four years ago. Washington was filled with civilians and soldiers and sailors. From the earliest daylight hour the streets were crowded with people. Pennsylvania avenue, the center of all things in Washington, was packed with the crowds, every man and woman in which sought, by an early arrival, to obtain a place of vantage from which the great procession, which for hours passed through the broad thoroughfare, could be seen. Every window and every balcony overlooking the avenue had been preempted for weeks by persons willing to pay great sums to get an unobstructed view of the passing marchers.

Decorations Are Beautiful.

The scene was one of constant movement and constant color. The red, white and blue floated from every flagpole and fell as drapery from every cornice. The inaugural committee succeeded this year in outdoing all previous efforts at decorative effect.

In the line of march leading from the capitol up Pennsylvania avenue, past the great treasury building and White House there were nearly 4,000 regular troops and twice as many members of the National Guard of the different states and independent military organizations. The civic features of the parade were many. The trades, the professions and all kinds of business activities were represented by thousands of persons who came to Washington to do honor to the country's new civil chief.

Early in the day the president-elect met the out-going president in the White House. About an hour before noon, the congressional committee of arrangements, consisting of Senators Knox, Lodge and Bacon, and Representatives Burke, Young and Gaines arrived at the executive mansion and informed the president and the president-elect that congress was in readiness for the ceremonies of the actual inauguration. At half-past eleven President Roosevelt and President-to be Taft entered a carriage, Mr. Taft sitting at the left of Mr. Roosevelt. In the carriages immediately following were the members of the congressional committee of arrangements. A body of veterans of the civil and Spanish wars acted as an escort for the out going and the incoming chiefs of state.

All the morning long the crowds had been awaiting the coming of the two officials. The cheering was constant and the names of both Roosevelt and Taft were intermingled with the shouts of applause. The drive to the capitol was made slowly in order that the veterans acting as a guard of honor might not be distanced.

The president and the president elect were escorted by the congressional committee into the senate wing of the capitol through the historic doorway of bronze on the east side of the building. They went directly to the president's room where they remained until the committee of arrangements came to them and announced that the senate was in readiness to receive them. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft then walked to the senate chamber, taking the seats reserved for them in the first row directly in front of the vice-president's desk.

Vice-President Fairbanks and Vice-President-elect Sherman drove to the capitol together and went directly to the room of the vice-president. In turn they were escorted to the senate chamber as the two chief figures of the occasion had been escorted before them. Mr. Fairbanks went at once to his place as presiding officer of the senate and Mr. Sherman took a seat at the left of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, just across the center aisle of the chamber.

Mr. Sherman Takes the Oath.

Edward Everett Hale, the veteran chaplain of the senate and one of the most picturesque figures in the United States, offered prayer. Immediately following the prayer, the oath of office was administered to Mr Sherman by the outgoing vice-president, Mr. Fairbanks. The new vice president next delivered his inaugural address, and then at once, as the first duty of his new office, he administered the oath to the newly elected senators of the United States.

Present on the floor of the senate chamber were many former senators of the United States, who have the privileges of the senate at all times owing to the fact of once having held membership in the body. The speaker and the entire house of representatives were present and with them were the chief officials of the district government, the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court, the heads of the executive departments of the government, the governors of the states and territories, the chief of staff of the army, and his aides, Admiral Dewey of the navy and his aides, and several veteran officers of the army and navy who, having received the thanks of congress for gallantry in battle, are entitled to the privileges of entering either branch of congress during session time. Among them was Gen. O. O. Howard.

Procession Through Rotunda.

As soon as the senators-elect had been sworn into office, a procession was formed to march from the senate chamber through the rotunda of the capitol to the platform on the center portico of the east side of the building. The sergeant-at-arms of the senate and his fellow officials of the house of representatives led the way. They were followed in order by the marshals of the District of Columbia and of the supreme court; the chief justice and associate justices; the congressional committee of arrangements; the president and the president-elect; the ambassadors to the United States; the ministers plenipotentiary; the vice-president and the secretary of the senate; the senators and ex-senators; the speaker of the house and the representatives in congress.

The platform upon which President Taft took the oath of office extended well out from the portico until it overhung the broad plaza to the east, where directly to the front were gathered the cadets from the military and naval academies, to the rear of whom were the other military bodies.

President Taft Inaugurated.

The white-haired chief justice of the United States, Melville W. Fuller, administered the oath of office to Mr. Taft, who, when he had taken it, bent and kissed the Bible held in the hand of his country's chief jurist. Immediately following the taking of the oath, President Taft delivered his inaugural address.

The president's speech frequently was interrupted by applause and at its close the great assembly broke into cheers. The president was congratulated by those who were close to him, including the retiring president and the other chief officials. President Taft then entered a carriage which was at once surrounded by the members of the Black Horse troop of Cleveland, O., which formed the special guard of honor. The president's carriage was driven north and then down the hill by the senate wing of the capitol until Pennsylvania avenue was reached. From that point the president drove slowly to the White House along the thoroughfare filled save for its center, with crowds of his cheering fellow citizens.

Regulars, Sailors and Marines from Atlantic Fleet, National Guardsmen and Scores of Civic Organizations.

BY EDWARD B. CLARK.

Washington, March 4.—Seldom has the national capital witnessed a parade that equaled in extent and magnificence that which followed President William H. Taft from the capitol to the White House immediately after his inauguration. As soon as the president's carriage started up Pennsylvania avenue the parade was formed.

The details of the military part of the procession were arranged by Brig. Gen. John A. Johnson, chief of staff to Gen. Bell, and by Maj. Samuel D. Sturgis, who acted as adjutant general.

Cheers for the Cadets.

The guard of honor attending President Taft was followed immediately by a mounted police guard and a full military band. Then came Maj. Gen. J. Franklin Bell, chief of the general staff of the United States army, who was the parade's grand marshal, and his staff. The military division had the right of way after the president's escort. At its head were the West Point cadets in their gray uniforms, marching with the perfect alignment for which the military students are famed. Behind the stripling soldiers came the stripling sailors, the midshipmen from the naval academy at Annapolis. The cadets of both schools were cheered, as they always have been cheered at every inaugural parade in which they have taken part. Immediately behind the future officers of army and navy came the regulars of the military service, veterans most of them, who had seen service in Cuba and in the Philippines, and, many of them, upon the plains in the days before the Indians had left the war path for the ways of peace.

In the line were the 2,600 men who had formed the Cuban army of pacification, and who had just left that island in pursuance of the policy of the United States to withdraw its troops as soon as the Cubans gave evidence that they were capable of governing themselves. In the force of regulars were cavalrymen, infantrymen and artillerymen, the yellow, the blue and the red of the service lending their colors, and something of the pomp and circumstance of war time to the parade.

Thousands from Sperry's Fleet.

In the waters of Hampton roads for ten days the fleet which had made its record breaking journey around the world had been assembled. The battleships, the cruisers, the destroyers and the torpedo boats were drawn upon for "jackies" to give the sea service an adequate representation in the inaugural ceremonies. There were 3,000 sailors from the Connecticut, the Illinois and the other ships of Sperry's fleet in the parade. The marines followed the sailors. There was a full regiment of them, men from that branch of the service which has taken the initiative in many of the beyond-the-sea troubles in which the forces of this country have been engaged—in Korea in the late '60's, in Cuba in 18[illegible] and in China in 1900.

Regulars and Sailors.

The regulars of the government service led the way, their conceded right. Behind them came the men who, in time of war, form first the reserve force, and later when brought into real soldiers' shape, the backbone force of the government's army—the National Guardsmen of the states of the union. The Guardsmen showed by their bearing, their marching and their evolutions the result of the deeper interest which in recent years has been taken in the military service by the civilian soldiers. The regulars and the guardsmen are closer together to-day in sympathy and in efficiency than ever they were before. The appearance of the state soldiers in the inaugural parade proved the truth of what many army officers have held recently—that to-day it is but a step from the discipline and the morale of the militia to the discipline and morale of the regulars.

Scores of Clubs in Line.

In the rear of the military division came the civic organizations. There were in line more than 100 clubs and political associations from all parts of the country, nearly all of them wearing some unique and distinguishing uniform. The American club of Pittsburg acted as personal escort to Thomas P. Morgan, the chief of the civic organizations' committee.

Among the organizations which had a place in the parade were several from President Taft's state—Ohio. Among these were the Citizens' Taft club and the Stamina Republican club of Cincinnati, Uniform Rank Knights of Maccabees, Cleveland; the Republican Glee club and the Buckeye Republican club of Columbus.

Veteran Organizations.

As a special honor to Vice-President James S. Sherman came the Conkling Unconditionals, a veteran marching political club, and the Sherman Scouts, both of Utica, N. Y., the home town of Mr. Sherman. New York being Mr. Roosevelt's state, as it is that of Mr. Sherman, contributed an unusual number of marching clubs to the ceremonies of the inauguration. Mr. Roosevelt's neighbors from Long Island paraded 250 strong. There were three Republican clubs from New York city, a political organization of colored men from Brooklyn, and several other political associations from different cities of the state.

Middle West Well Represented.

Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, Minnesota and other states of the middle west and of the south were represented by associations of citizens, political clubs, and by prominent state, county and municipal officials. Many veterans of the civil war who served in the ranks of the union or in the ranks of the confederacy were present in the parade. There were more former confederates in line than were present at any previous inauguration of a Republican president.

Luncheon in White House.

As soon as President Taft reached the White House he entered and was greeted by the members of a specially invited presidential party, including the governors of several states, prominent federal officials, personal friends of the president and the members of the presidential family to a remote degree of relationship. A light luncheon was served in the great state dining-room, and as soon as it was over the president walked across the grounds of the White House to the presidential reviewing stand built on the south side of the avenue directly in front of the main entrance to the White House and facing Lafayette square. The president took his place on the reviewing stand, and with him were the members of the presidential party. Vice-President Sherman stood on the immediate right of the chief executive. Across Pennsylvania avenue directly in front of the president was a huge stand for spectators occupying the entire length of one side of Lafayette square.

Parade Passes In Review.

As soon as the president appeared on the reviewing stand the leading band of the procession, which had been halted to await the appearance of Mr. Taft, began to play "Hail to the Chief." Gen. Bell gave the order to pass in review, and the great procession, having its head at the White House, moved forward to pass before the chief magistrate. As body after body of soldiers, sailors and civilians passed, they saluted and the president saluted in turn.

It took the procession three hours to pass the reviewing stand. It was a great sight, full of interest and color. Under the direction of the trained military chieftains who had given their time to the perfection of details, the parade passed quickly and in perfect form. When in front of the reviewing stand some of the civic marching clubs showed their proficiency in drill by performing evolutions. The regulars and National Guardsmen, however, swept by in perfect military precision. The parade was worthy of the occasion that called it into marching line.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.—Miss Leslie was attacked by a poisonous snake. Blake killed it and saved its poison to kill game.

CHAPTER XVIII.—For the second time Winthrope was attacked by fever. He and Blake disagreed.

CHAPTER XIX.—Blake made a strong door for the private compartment of Miss Leslie's cave-home. A terrible storm raged that night. Winthrope stole into her room, but she managed to swing her door closed in time.

CHAPTER XX.

The Hurricane Blast.

FOR a moment that seemed a moment of eternity she lay on her bed staring into the blank darkness. The storm burst with a crashing uproar that brought her to her feet with a shriek. Her giant tree creaked and strained under the impact of the terrific hurricane blasts that came howling through the cleft like a rout of shrieking fiends. The peals of thunder merged into one continuous roar, beneath which the solid ledges of rocks jarred and quivered. The sky was a pall of black clouds, meshed with a dazzling network of forked lightning.

The girl stood motionless, stunned by the uproar, appalled by the blinding glare of the thunderbolts; yet even more fearful of the figure which every flash showed her still lurking beneath the door. A gust-borne bough struck with numbing force against her upraised arm. But she took no heed. She was unaware of the swirl of rain and sticks and leaves that was driving in through the open entrance.

On a sudden the door shook free from its props and whirled violently around on its balance-bar. There was a shriek that pierced above the shrilling of the cyclone—a single human shriek.

The girl sprang across the cave. The heavy door swished up before her and down again, its lower edge all but grazing her face. For a moment it stopped in a vertical position and hung quivering, like a beast about to leap upon its prey. Too excited to comprehend the danger of the act, the girl sprang forward and shot one of the thick bars into its socket.

A fierce gust leaped against the outer face of the door and thrust in upon it, striving to burst it bodily from its bearings. The top and the free side of the bottom bowed in. But the branches were still green and tough, the bamboo like whalebone and the drunken creepers held the frame together as though the joints were lashed with wire rope. Failing to smash in the elastic structure or to snap the crossbar it were as if the blast flung itself alternately against the top and bottom in a fierce attempt to again whirl the frame about. The white glare streaming in through the interstices showed the girl her opportunity. She grasped another bar and shot it into its socket as the lower part of the door gave back with the shifting of the pressure to the top. It was then a simple matter to slide the remaining bars into the deep-sunk holes. Within half a minute she had made the door fast from the first bar to the sixth.

A heavy spray was beating in upon her through the chinks of the framework. She drew back and sought shelter in a niche at the side. Narrow as was the slit above the top of the door, it let in a torrent of water, which spouted clear across and against the far wall of the cave. It gushed down upon her bed and was already flooding the cave floor.

She piled higher the cocoanuts stored in her niche, and perched herself upon the heap to keep above the water. But even in her sheltered corner the eddying wind showered her with spray. She waded across for her skin-covered sunshade, and returned to huddle beneath it, in the still misery and terror of a hunted animal that has crept wounded into a hole.

During the first hurricane there had been companions to whom she could look for help and comfort, and she had been to a degree unaware of the greatness of the danger. But in the few short weeks since she had caught more than one glimpse of Primeval Nature—she of the bloody fang, blind, remorseless, insensate, destroying, ever destroying.

True, this was on solid land, while before there had been the peril of the sea. But now the girl was alone. Outside the straining walls of her refuge, the hurricane yelled and shrieked and roared—a headless, formless monster, furious to burst in upon her, to overthrow her stanch old tree giant, that in his fall his shattered trunk might crush and mangle her. Or at any instant a thunder-bolt might rend open the great tower of living wood, and hurl her blackened body into the pool on the cave floor.

Once she fancied that she heard Blake shouting outside the door; but when she screamed a shrill response, the blast mocked her with echoing shrieks, and she dared not venture to free the door. If it were Blake, he did not shout again. After a time she began to think that the sound had been no more than a freak of the shifting wind. Yet the thought of him out in the full fury of the cyclone served to turn her thoughts from her own danger. She prayed aloud for his safety, beseeching God that he be spared. She sought to pray even for Winthrope. But the vision of that beastly face rose up before her, and she could not—then.

Presently she became aware of a change in the storm. The terrific gusts blew with yet greater violence, the thunder crashed heavier, the lightning filled the air with a flame of dazzling white light. But the rain no longer gushed across on the spot where her bed had been. It was entering at a different angle, and its force was broken by the bend in the thick wall of the entrance. After a time the deluge dashed aslant the entrance, gushing down the door in a cataract of foam.

Another interval, and the driving downpour no longer struck even the edge of the opening. The wind was veering rapidly as the cyclone center moved past on one side. The area of the hurricane was little more than thrice that of a tornado, and it was advancing along its course at great speed. An hour more, and the outermost rim of the huge whirl was passing over the cleft.

Quickly the hurricane gusts fell away to a gale; the gale became a breeze; the breeze lulled and died away, stifled by the torrential rain.

Within the baobab all was again dark and silent. Utterly exhausted, the girl had sunk back against the friendly wall of the tree, and fallen asleep.

She was wakened by a hoarse call: "Miss Jenny! Miss Jenny, answer me! Are you all right?"

She started up, barely saving herself from a fall as the big unhusked nuts rolled beneath her feet. The morning sunlight was streaming in over her door. She sprang down ankle-deep into the mire of the cave floor, and ran to loosen the bars. As the door swung up, she darted out, with a cry of delight: "You are safe—safe! Oh, I was so afraid for you! But you're drenched! You must build a fire—dry yourself—at once!"

"Wait," said Blake. "I've got to tell you something."

He caught her outstretched hands, and pushed them down with gentle force. His face was grave, almost solemn.

"Think you can stand bad news—a shock?"

"I— What is it? You look so strange!"

"It's about Winthrope—something very bad—"

She turned, with a gasp, and hid her face in her hands, shuddering with horror and loathing.

"Oh! oh!" she cried. "I know already—I know all!"

"All?" demanded Blake, staring blankly.

"Yes; all! And—and he made me think it was you!" She gasped, and fell silent.

Blake's face went white. He spoke in a clear, vibrant voice, tense as an overstrained violin string: "I am

"I Know Already—I Know All."

speaking about Winthrope — understand me? — Winthrope. He has been badly hurt."

"The door swung down and struck him, when he was creeping in."

"God!" roared Blake. "I picked him up like a sick baby—the beast!—'stead of grinding my heel in his face! God! I'll—"

"Tom! don't—don't even speak of it! Tom!"

"God! When a helpless girl—when a—!" He choked, beside himself with rage.

She sprang to him, and caught his sleeve in a convulsive grasp. "Hush, for mercy's sake! Tom Blake, remember—you're a man!"

He calmed like a ferocious dog at the voice of its master; but it was several minutes before he could bring himself to obey her insistent urging that he should return to the injured man.

"I'll go," he at last growled. "Wouldn't do it even for you, but he's good as dead—lucky for him!"

"Dead!"

"Dying. You stay away."

He went around the baobab and a few paces along the cleft to the place where a limp form lay huddled on the ledges, out of the mud. Slowly, as though drawn by the fascination of horror, the girl crept after him. When she saw the broken, storm-beaten thing that had been Winthrope, she stopped, and would have turned back. After all, as Blake had said, he was dying—

When she stood at the feet of the writhing figure, and looked down into the battered face, it required all her will-power to keep from fainting. Blake frowned up at her for an instant, but said nothing.

Winthrope was speaking, feebly and brokenly, yet distinctly: "Really, I did not mean any harm—at first—you know. But a man does not always have control—"

"Not a beast like you!" growled Blake.

"Ow! Don't 'it me! I say now, I'm done for! My legs are cold already—"

"Oh, quick, Mr. Blake! build a fire! It may be, some hot broth—"

"Too late," muttered Blake. "See here, Winthrope, there's no use lying about it. You're going out mighty soon. See if you can't die like a man."

"Die! Gawd, but I can't die—I can't die— Ow! it burns!"

He flung up a hand, and sought to tear at his wounds.

"Hold hard!" cried Blake, catching the hand in an iron grip.

Something in his touch, or the tone of command, seemed to cower the wretched man into a state of abject submission.

"S'elp me, I'll confess!—I'll confess all!" he babbled. "The stones are sewed in the stomach pad; I 'ad to take 'em hout of their settings, and melt up the gold." He paused, and a cunning smile stole over his distorted features. "Ho, wot a bloomin' lark! Valet plays the gent, an' they never 'as a hinkling! Mr. Cecil Winthrope, hif you please, an' a 'int of a title—wot a lark! 'Awkings, me lad, you're a gay 'oaxer! Wot a lark! wot a lark!"

Again there was a pause. The breath of the wounded man came in labored gasps. There was an ominous rattling in his throat. Yet once again he rallied, and this time his eyes turned to Miss Leslie, bright with an agonized consciousness of her presence and of all his guilt and shame.

His voice shrilled out in quavering appeal: "Don't—don't look at me, miss! I tried to make myself a gentleman; God knows I tried! I fought my way up out of the East End—out of that hell—and none ever lifted finger to help me. I educated myself like a scholar—then the stock sharks cheated me of my savings—out of the last penny; and I had to take service. My God! a valet—his grace's valet, and I a scholar! Do you wonder the devil got into me? Do you—"

Blake's deep voice, firm but strangely husky, broke in upon and silenced the cry of agony: "There, I guess you've said enough."

"Enough—and last night— My God! to be such a beast! The devil tempted me—aye, and he's paid me out in my own coin! I'm done for! God ha' mercy on me!—God ha' mercy—"

Again came the gasping rattle; this time there was no rally.

Blake thrust himself between Miss Leslie and the crumpled figure.

"Get back around the tree," he said harshly.

"What are you going to do?"

"That's my business," he replied. He thrust his burning-glass into her hand. "Here; go and build a fire, if you can find any dry stuff."

"You're not going to— You'll bury him!"

"Yes. Whatever he may have been, he's dead now, poor devil!"

"I can't go," she half whispered, "not until—until I've learned— Do you—can you tell me just what is paranoia?"

Blake studied a little, and tapped the top of his head.

"Near as I can say, it's softening of the brain—up there."

"Do you think that—" she hesitated—"that he had it?"

Again Blake paused to consider.

"Well, I'm no alienist. I thought him a softy from the first. But that was all in line with what he was playing on us—British dude. Fooled me, and I'd been chumming with Jimmy Scarbridge—and Jimmy was the straight goods, fresh imported—monocle even—when I first ran up against him. No; this—this Hawkins, if that's his name, had brains all right. Still, he may have been cracked. When folks go dotty they sometimes get extra 'cute. The best I can think of him is that losing his savings may have made him slip a cog, and then the scare over the way we landed here and his spells of fever probably hurried up the softening."

"Then you believe his story?"

"Yes, I do. But if you'll go, please."

"One thing more—I must know now! Do you remember the day when you set up the signal and you—you quarreled with him?"

Blake reddened and dropped his gaze. "Did he go and tell you that? The sneak!"

"If you please, let us say nothing more about him. But would you care to tell me what you meant—what you said then?"

Blake's flush deepened; but he raised his head, and faced her squarely as he answered: "No; I'm not going to repeat any dead man's talk; and as for what I said, this isn't the time or place to say anything in that line—now that we're alone. Understand?"

"I'm afraid I do not, Mr. Blake. Please explain."

"Don't ask me, Miss Jenny. I can't tell you now. You'll have to wait till we get aboard ship. We'll catch a steamer before long. 'Tisn't every one of them that goes ashore in these blows."

"Why did you build that door? Did you suspect—" She glanced down at the huddled figure between them.

Blake frowned and hesitated; then burst out almost angrily: "Well, you know now he was a sneak; so it's not blabbing to tell that much—I knew he was before; and it's never safe to trust a sneak."

"Thank you!" she said, and she turned away quickly that she might not again look at the prostrate figure.

SCIENCE AND INVENTION

THE HALLEY COMET.

Astronomers Are Watching for the Visitor, Says Garrett P. Serviss.

The keynote of astronomy in the present year is furnished by the approaching return of the great comet of Halley. That comet will not be in perhilion, i.e., at its nearest point with regard to the sun, until May, 1910, but during this year it will come into sight, and every observatory in the world will be busy studying it. The preparations for this great astronomical event have already, for a long time, been going on, because it is an unparalleled thing of its kind.

For this reason, writes Garrett P. Serviss in the New York World, I give a little diagram showing the orbit of Halley's comet and the position which the comet occupies at the present moment. It is now about as far from the sun as the planet Jupiter, and if it were a large solid body like Jupiter it would already be plainly visible to the naked eye.

But a comet is not a solid body, although it is probably made up of solid particles, and only when it gets near the sun does it begin to display its characteristic features. Then only is the wonderful tail unfolded to amaze all beholders. The tail of a comet is believed to consist of immeasurably minute particles which are shot off from the head, or nucleus, by some repellant force emanating from the sun.

Recent investigations seem to prove that this force is electric in its nature. It has also been thought that the "push" of the light waves from the sun may play a part in the phenomenon, for, strange as it may seem, it is now known that the waves of light are able to drive before them excessively small particles of matter which they may encounter. The idea is that the heat and perhaps the electro-magnet action of the sun on the approaching comet have the effect of releasing infinitesimal particles, which are then driven away by the flowing light waves (which travel 185,000 miles per second).

The certainty that the sun exerts a repellant force of some kind is sufficiently established by the well-known fact that the tail of a comet always points away from the sun, changing its direction as the head of the comet [illegible] around the sun, so that the tail always remains on the off side. The reason why the return of Halley's comet excites so much attention from astronomers is because it is absolutely the only really great comet the period of whose revolution and the date of whose returns are known. It comes back once about every 76 years. It was seen in the time of Sir Isaac Newton, and then Halley, who in this respect outstripped Newton, detected the fact that it was a periodic comet and predicted its return in 1758.

Halley was dead long before the comet got back, but back it came as he had predicted. The next return was in 1835. The present return is the third since the days of Newton. Just at what moment it will be caught sight of nobody can tell. That fact gives special zest to the search. There is some hope that photography may reveal it some time this winter, for very faint objects are frequently caught in that way before they become apparent to the telescope.

SHOWED ENTERPRISE.

How Railroads Gave Information to Travelers on Election Night.

One of the most interesting innovations of the recent presidential election was the arrangement made by at least ten of the great railroad systems of the country to furnish election returns all through the night to the passengers.

Special wires were run from the main offices of these systems into the offices of one or another of the many metropolitan newspapers, and the latest returns were placed on board the trains at every stop and posted in conspicuous places. When regular stops were infrequent the trains were slowed down at small towns and the returns, especially telegraphed to the station agents of those places, picked up.

Starch Water-Proof.

By a German patented process, starch is made insoluble in hot water by treating it, in the cold, with formaldehyde and a moderately strong acid. The product is distinguished from that obtained from starch and formaldehyde at a high temperature by the fact that the starch grains remain unaltered and quite permanent. It is not only insoluble in boiling water, but it is not attacked by soda lye or other strong alkalies. It may be employed as a filter in plastic compositions, as a dressing for fabrics and in the manufacture of paper.

Ingenious Ponies.

A rather curious habit has been developed by Mexican ponies in connection with the cactus thorns. When these creatures are thirsty, it is said that, before attempting to put their mouths to the prickly plant, they will first of all stand and kick at the cactus with their heels. By this means the thorns are broken and the leathery skin bruised, and so the ponies can drink their fill of the cool juice without injury.—Sunday Strand.

Signals That Carry Far.

When an African chief of the Nigerian tribes is ready to begin harvesting and requires extra assistance, says Popular Mechanics, he sets some of his tribesmen drumming. They beat a huge kettledrum made of skin stretched on a calabash and a small side drum. The sound of the drumming carries a great distance, and laborers come in from all directions.

We have not been represented from this community for some time so we will jot a few items.

Weather is very favorable for this time of year, only we have plenty of mud to spare.

The people who have sugar camps have been making some sugar here.

Mr. James Harvey was visiting Mr. Frank Bray last Sunday.

Miss Pearl Luzier, of St. George, is visiting her brother, Mr. James Luzier, at this writing.

Our school is progressing nicely under the able management of Miss Ida Harvey.

The literary, which meets every Thursday night at this place, has become very interesting and we think is doing much good.

Miss Maggie and Pearl Luzier, Ida Harvey and Mr. John Luzier were visiting at Mrs. Norman Bray's last Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Bell White, of Stoyer, are visiting friends and relatives here.

Misses Edna Browning and Ida Harvey were visiting friends at Blaine Saturday last.

Last Sunday evening a party of our young folks gathered at Mr. Frank Bray's home and had singing school. All report a very good time.

Mr. Abe Bray was visiting at Mr. Wallace Junkin's Sunday last.

If this escapes the waste basket, we may call again.

Success to THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1909. NUMBER 2

MR. G. SEMMES HAMILL APPOINTED CHIEF JUDGE

Of the Orphans' Court By Governor Crothers and Qualified Tuesday.

Chief Judge G. Semmes Hamill, of the Garrett County Orphans' Court!

This appointment came as quite a surprise to the residents of Garrett county on last Saturday when Governor Austin L. Crothers announced the appointment of Mr. Hamili to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Chief Judge John L Fitzwater, which was forwarded to the Governor two weeks ago.

As soon as it became known that Judge Fitzwater had resigned from the office a number of aspirants to succeed him announced themselves. Prior, however, to the resignation of Judge Fitzwater, at a time when that gentleman intimated that he intended to retire from the bench, it was the intention of the Democratic Committee to recommend the appointment of Mr. W. F. King, but for some reason he was sidetracked. Later the friends of Dr. E. H. Bartlett, who served on the bench a number of years ago when he was appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Judge Henry Kamp, Sr., pushed him into the field and of the three committeemen, two of them, Ex-Senator R. T. Browning and Mr. William Miller, wrote personal letters to Governor Crothers recommending his appointment. Mr. Hamill, the third committeeman, placed himself directly beneath the plum tree by making a personal visitation to the Governor and the fruit fell into his lap.

Judge Hamill's commission was received by Clerk Tower from the Governor's office Tuesday morning and immediately thereafter the oath of office was subscribed to by the appointee and he entered upon the discharge of his judicial duties, sitting with his associates in court Tuesday morning.

The Unsaved.

A newspaper editor who has observed closely and reached several wise conclusions writes in missionary strain of the multitudes of people who need religion:

The man who leaves his horse standing out in the cold all day without a blanket; the man who growls like a wild beast when his wife asks him for money; the woman who is not what she ought to be; the minister who is looking for an easier place and a higher salary; the man who walks the streets with his hands in his pockets, while his wife carries the baby; the man who keeps a dog and says he can't afford to take the home paper.

Call for Your Letters.

BLIZZARD OF '88 WORST IN YEARS

Prevailing for Four Days and Caused Enormous Losses.

The worst blizzard in recent years prevailed over the Middle Atlantic States on March 11, 12, 13 and 14, 1888. It is estimated that at that time 1500 telegraph poles were blown down between Baltimore and New York. The loss to the telegraph companies amounted to many thousands of dollars. Wires were down all along the Atlantic coast. Telegraphing between Baltimore and the West was done by sending messages down to Atlanta and thence up to Cincinnati and Chicago. Communcation from New York to London and thence to Boston.

Many people perished in the storm, even in the cities. The death of Roscoe Conkling was due to exposure in this blizzard in New York.

Another great blizzard was on February 11, 1899 This storm extended from Maine to Florida, and in some places the snowfall was 15.5 inches. Railroad traffic was almost suspended, and business was practically at a standstill. On February 13 the thermometer fell to 6 above zero in Baltimore, and the mercury ranged from 8 to 18 degrees in the South. In the country in many places the snow was three feet deep, and in Frederick county, Maryland, the drifts were 20 feet deep. Ice was 14 inches thick at Havre de Grace, and at Ocean City, Md, the surf was frozen on the beach.

Large Tract of Timber Purchased.

The purchase last week of 17,238 acres of timberlands located in Pocahontas county, W. Va., by Mr. Merritt Wilson, of Wildell, W. Va, formerly of Wilson, this county, and Mr. Richard Chaffey, of Elkins, will develop one of the largest tracts of virgin forest remaining in West Virginia. The land is located along the line and fronts for seven miles on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. A company has been chartered by the State of West Virginia with a capital of $200,000 under the name of the Chaffey-Wilson Lumber Company to take over the property. The negotiations for the purchase were conducted by Mr. Wilson and Mr. E. H. Sincell, attorney for the purchasers, and necessitated the absence of Mr. Sincell from home for the past three weeks. This is regarded as the finest timber proposition in West Virginia and constitutes the largest deal made in that state within the past year. The property has upon it an immense amount of the finest hemlock timber and various kinds of hardwoods consisting of oak, chestnut and also a considerable amount of white pine and poplar and has been estimated to cut 120,000,000 feet. The purchase price of the land has not been made known, but it is understood to have approximated many thousands of dollars.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S OPINION OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT

He Says That To Know Him Is To Love Him.

In its issue of March 6 Collier's Weekly published the following by President-elect Taft under the caption "My Predecessor":

Mr. Roosevelt and I came to know each other when he was chairman of the Civil Service Commission and I was Solicitor General in 1890 to 1892, in Washington. We were both subordinates in the Harrison administration. We lived in the same part of Washington, he on Nineteenth street near the British Embassy, and I on Dupont Circle. Our wives knew each other well, and some of our children were born about the same time.

We found, after discussion, that we agreed in quite a marked way in our views of proper political ideals and proper political methods. We were as emphatic in the judgment that the political reformer who was not willing to accept conditions as they were as the basis for his action, and to work for the better things that were practical, without achieving all that he would like to achieve, was rather a hindrance than a help to progress, and merely assisted the permanent control of the boss and the machine. This, I think, had been the moving principle of Mr. Roosevelt's career. He has believed in practical progress and not in ideals which make for no real advancement.

No one associates with Mr. Roosevelt closely without having the strongest affection for him. His mind, his disposition and his temperament are all of that class that would rather make him agree than disagree with the people with whom he comes in contact. But this is not to say that he does not enjoy a controversy and a fight according to the rules of the game, for he does.

He believes as strongly as possible in team work, and I never served any man, or hope to serve under another man, so intensely loyal to the cause which we were both seeking, to uphold and so generous to in his acceptance of the full responsibility for his subordinates in the work as Theodore Roosevelt. I never served under another who was as generous in his praise of these who worked with him and who was as willing to accord more than their deserts to the men who were shoulder to shoulder with him in the fight.

That characteristic of his has been calculated to tie men to him with bonds of steel.

The general theory that Mr. Roosevelt is of exceedingly impulsive nature is perhaps justified to the extent of saying that he has a marvelous quickness for approaching a question and reaching the nub of it and almost an overwhelming desire to decide and get rid of the issue presented as promptly as possible. I never knew a man who worked as far in advance of what was to be done and who kept his engagements with reference to what he had agreed to do as providently as Mr. Roosevelt. Perhaps I value this virtue more highly because I lack it myself.

The result of quick decision and action might have impaired the success of Mr. Roosevelt's career if it had not been that he has been freer than most men from that pride of opinion which prevents many men from admitting their error, reversing their judgment and changing their course. I have had to do with a number of presidents and with a good many chiefs, and I am well within the truth when I say that I never met a man who, upon proper presentation, would reverse himself and with as little trace of obstinacy or unreasonableness as Mr. Roosevelt.

The relation between Mr. Roosevelt and myself has been one of close and sweet intimacy. It has never been ruffled in the slightest degree, and I do not think that we have ever misunderstood each other. Mr. Roosevelt's tastes and mine have not been the same.

In the matter of athletics he takes to those games more violent than I am suited to and more violent than I like. He has the strongest literary sense and a power of application in reading current literature that to me is marvelous. He loves the woods; he loves hunting; he loves life akin to that of the pioneer; he loves roughing it, and I don't.

Mr. Roosevelt never had the education and practice of a lawyer. His intense desire to reach practical results for good has made him at times impatient of the restraint of legal methods; while I have been trained as a lawyer and a judge and am strongly imbued with the necessity for legal methods as 11 years on the bench are likely to make one; and yet, in spite of this difference of method and difference of temperament, it is quite remarkable to me, and we have frequently commented on it to each other, that we have been in agreement in our views as to the results that ought to be obtained in the matter of government and political progress, even to details, much more than other men who have come into association with both of us.

Mr. Roosevelt's courage in the expression of his convictions I need not dwell upon. His real, and what one might almost describe as affectionate, interest in the welfare of the poor man, of the man who has the odds against him in life's struggle and the sincerity of his desire to help that class of men, no one who ever had to do with him could doubt; and his insistence has always been that the difficulty between the socalled classes in the country, and the failure of educated lawyers and political economists and others to bring about proper relations between the well-to-do and those who are dependent upon wages for their living, arises from an aosence of a proper point of view on the part of these who are leading comfortable lives.

The confidence that the common plain people, including the wage earners, have had in Theodore Roosevelt as their representative and defender has been most perfectly placed; for there never was a champion more sincere in support of their real interests, and yet there never was a friend franker in his statement to them of the unpleasant truths that occasionally they ought to be told.

Mr. Roosevelt understands the plain people about as well as Lincoln did, shares their feelings, and gives accurate expression to them. Hence his marvelous hold upon the great body of the people, which has continued to exist in undiminished strength in spite of the criticism heard of him and his methods in quarters more conspicuous than really significant.

When the friction of the last few months shall be forgotten, when the mists of momentary irritation shall have disappeared, the greatness of Theodore Roosevelt as President and leader of men in one of the great moral movements of the country's history will become clear to everyone, and he will take his place in history with Washington and Lincoln.

ANNUAL MUNICIPAL ELECTION IN OAKLAND

Resulted on Monday In the Selection of Two Democrats and One Republican.

The annual election of members of the Town Council of Oakland occurred Monday of this week, resulting in the election of two Democrats and one Republican, the successful candidates being Messrs. James H. Painter and Charles Liller, Democrats, and D. E. Bolden, Republican.

Both parties held conventions last Thursday night when candidates were nominated, the Republicans placing Messrs. D. E. Bolden, Samuel Lawton and E. A. Weimer in the field, while the Democrats nominated Messrs. Painter, Liller and W. G. Hinebaugh.

On the Democratic ticket two of the candidates, Messrs. Painter and Hinebaugh were retiring members of Council, their term having expired March 1st, and Mr. Liller is an ex-member of that body.

Mr. Bolden, the successful candidate of the Republicans, served several years in the capacity of Councilman. Mr. Lawton one of the defeated candidates, also served as a member of the body several years ago, while Mr. Weimer has never held public office under the municipality, but served with success for two years as County Treasurer.

What contributed to the defeat of the Republican candidates was the hard work on the part of their opponents and the influence exerted for the success of the Democrats by certain elements who were almost to a man opposed to the success of the Republican ticket.

With the election of the two Democratic members of the Council that body will stand four Democrats and two Republicans with a Democratic Mayor.

The result of the balloting is as follows:

D. E. Bolden, Republican	142
Samuel Lawton, Republican	113
E. A. Weimer, Republican	99
Jas. H. Painter, Democrat	141
Charles Liller, Democrat	141
Wm. G. Hinebaugh, Democrat	134

DEATH RECORD.

DR. B. FRANKLIN LAUGHLIN.

In the death of Dr. B. Franklin Laughlin, son of Dr. and Mrs. James W. Laughlin, of Deer Park, a man who promised to become a bright and shining mark in his profession, passed away. With the death of this young man, occurring not unexpectedly, many hearts are made sad. He was well liked, highly esteemed and was held in brotherly affection by numberless acquaintances and friends. Born September 19, 1876, at Oak Forest, Greene county, Pa., he came with his parents to Deer Park a few years later where he was raised and continued to reside until a few years ago. When quite a young man he was sent to the West Virginia University at Morgantown, W. Va., from which institution he graduated at the head of his class in June, 1899. Later he took a course in the medical department of the University of Maryland, and was graduated in 1904. Returning to Garrett county he begun the practice of medicine at Deer Park and shortly afterwards located at Kingwood, W. Va., where he remained until his health failed and he was forced to retire from active practice. His condition, however, did not improve with the cessation from wrrk, but on the other hand gradually grew worse, the malady with which he suffered being paralysis, which eventually affected his entire system. In the hope that some relief would result he was sent to a private hospital near Baltimore where he was treated for several months and was only recently returned to his old home at Deer Park where he was cared for by his relatives and friends until the end came releasing him from his sufferings. Dr. Laughlin was happily married June 5, 1907, to Miss Sue Browning, daughter of Mr. and the late Mrs. M. A. Browning, of Kitzmiller, whose devotion to her husband throughout his long illness was indeed that of a true wife and helpmate. Besides his parents and wife Dr. Laughlin leaves surviving him two brothers and a sister. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and also of Oakland Lodge Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons. His funeral will occur with Masonic ceremonies at Deer Park on Friday of this week at the hour of noon.

MRS. EMMA CATHARINE CHISHOLM.

Mrs. Emma Catharine, aged 20 years, wife of Mr. Archibald Chisholm, died at her home near Swallow Falls Wednesday of this week after a short illness of bright's disease. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Groves and was married one year ago today to Mr. Chisholm. Recently a child was born to the couple which survives the mother. The funeral will occur today with interment at Oak Grove, near Friendsville, with services by the pastor of the U. B. church, of which the deceased was a member. To the sorrowing husband we extend our sincere sympathy.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Summer Meeting Will Be Held There the Latter Part of July.

In a letter to THE REPUBLICAN received yesterday morning from State Senater W. McCulloh Brown, the information is conveyed that the summer meeting of the State Horticultural Society, of which Senator Brown is president, will be held at Mountain Lake Park July 30th and 31st.

In the letter to THE REPUBLICAN Senator Brown says:

"Through Dr. Davis the Park Association has extended a cordial welcome to the Society. I have for some time been working to secure this meeting for our county, for I feel strongly that the advantages of our region and our resources should become better and more widely known throughout the State, and there can be no better way than to show horticulturists our soil and what we can produce from it. I hope that real local interest may be awakened in this meeting and that we may not only have a good attendance but that we may be able to have some exhibits of our products."

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower since our last report:

Ross Stillwell and Christena Greenlee, both of Wheeling.

Simon Beachy, of Bittinger, and Katie A. Bender of Accident.

Schuyler Goff Hamelton and Mary Patterson, both of Gaston, W. Va.

Ira Swift McIntyre, of Cascara, W. Va., and Sallie Musgrave of Reedsville, W. Va.

Reid Ambrose Weimer and Susan Elizabeth Hay, both of Somerset, Pa.

Basie Garlitts and Lulu VanSickle, both of Friendsville.

Harvey E. Delancy and Moma L. Lucas, both of Cornwallis, W. Va.

Jasper Delbert Jones and Ellie Ramsey, both of Barber, W. Va.

Roy Arnett McCauley, of Blaine, and Louisa H. Wellons, of Stoyer.

Christian Landsperger and Bertha Taylor, both of Gratztown, Pa.

Vacancy Filled.

At a meeting held in Oakland Tuesday by the Republican County Committee the vacancy in the committee caused by the death of Mr. A. F. George was filled by the selection of Mr. Jonas Yutzy of District No. 8, the appointment being made by the Chairman, Col. A. G. Sturgiss, and Mr. H. J. Speicher, secretary of the committee.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.—Miss Leslie was attacked by a poisonous snake. Blake killed it and saved its poison to kill game.

CHAPTER XVIII.—For the second time Winthrope was attacked by fever. He and Blake disagreed.

CHAPTER XIX.—Blake made a strong door for the private compartment of Miss Leslie's cave-home. A terrible storm raged that night. Winthrope stole into her room, but she managed to swing her door closed in time.

CHAPTER XXI.

Wreckage and Salvage.

ALL the wood in the cleft was sodden from the fierce downpour that had accompanied the cyclone; all the cleft bottom other than the bare ledges was a bed of mud; everything without the tree-cave had been either blown away or heaped with broken boughs and mud-spattered rubbish. But the girl had far too much to think about to feel any concern over the mere damage and destruction of things. It was rather a relief to find something that called for work.

Not being able to find dry fuel she gathered a quantity of the least sodden of the twigs and branches and spread them out on a ledge in the clear sunshine. While her firewood was drying she scraped away the mud and litter heaped upon her rude hearth. She then began a search for lost articles. When she dug out the pottery ware she found her favorite stew pot and one of the platters in fragments. The drying-frames for the meat had been blown away, and so had the antelope and hyena skins.

Catching sight of a bit of white down among the bamboos, she went to it, and was not a little surprised to see the tattered remnant of her duck skirt. It had evidently been torn from the signal staff by the first gust of the cyclone, whirled down into the cleft by some flaw or eddy in the wind, and wadded so tightly into the heart of the thick clump of stems that all the fury of the storm had failed to dislodge it. Its recovery seemed to the girl a special providence; for of course they must keep up a signal on the cliff.

Having started her fire and set on a stew, she hunted out her sewing materials from their crevice in the cave and began mending the slits in the torn flag. While she worked she sat on a shaded ledge, her bare feet toasting in the sun, and her soggy, mud-smeared moccasins drying within reach. When Blake appeared, the moccasins were still where she had first set them, but the little pink feet were safely tucked up beneath the tattered flag. Fortunately, the sight of the white cloth prevented Blake from noticing the moccasins.

"Hello!" he exclaimed. "What's that?—the flag? Say, that's luck! I'll break out a bamboo right off. Old staff's carried clean away."

"Mr. Blake—just a moment, please. What have you done with—with it?"

Blake jerked his thumb upward.

"You have carried him up on the cliff?"

"Best place I could think of. No accumulated slime and ooze. So now he washed out his tattered garments as well as he could without soap, and while they were drying on the sun-scorched rocks, swam about in the clear, tonic sea-water, quite as reckless of the sharks as he had been of the ugly crocodiles in the river.

For all this, he was back at the baobab before Miss Leslie had stitched up the last slit in the torn flag.

She looked up at him, with a brave attempt at a smile.

"I am afraid I'm not much of a needle-woman," she sighed. "Look at those stitches!"

"Don't fret. They'll hold all right, and that's what we want," he reassured her. "Give it me, now. I've got to get it up, and hurry back for a nap. No sleep last night—I was out beyond the river, in the swamp—and to-night I'll have to go on watch. The barricade is down."

"Oh, that is too bad! Couldn't I take a turn on watch?"

Blake shook his head. "No; I'll sleep to-day, and work rebuilding the barricade to-night. Toward morning I might build up the fire, and take a nap."

He caught up the flag and its new staff, and swung away through the cleft.

He returned much sooner than Miss Leslie expected, and at once began to throw up a small lean-to of bamboos over a ledge at the cliff foot, behind the baobab. The girl thought he was making himself a hut, in place of the canopy under which he had slept before the storm, which, like Winthrope's, had been carried away. But when he stopped work, he laconically informed her that all she had to do to complete her new house was to dry some leaves.

"But I thought it was for yourself!" she protested. "I will sleep inside the tree."

"Doc Blake says no!" he rejoined—"not till it's dried out."

She glanced at his fact, and replied, without a moment's hesitancy: "Very well. I will do what you think best."

"That's good," he said, and went at once to lie down for his much needed sleep.

He awoke just soon enough before dark to see the results of her hard day's labor. All the provisions stored in the tree had been brought out to dry, and a great stack of fuel, ready for burning, was piled up against the baobab; while all about the tree the rubbish had been neatly gathered together in heaps. Blake looked his admiration for her industry. But then his forehead wrinkled.

"I Wish He Hadn't Rushed Off So Suddenly."

"You oughtn't to've done so much," he admonished.

"I'll show you I can tote fair!" she rejoined. During the afternoon she had recalled to mind that odd expression of a southern girl chum, and had been waiting her opportunity to banter him with it.

He stared at her open-eyed, and laughed.

"Say, Miss Jenny, you'd better look out. You'll be speaking American, first thing!"

Thereupon, they fell to chatting like children out of school, each happy to be able to forget for the moment that broken figure up on the cliff top and the haunting fear of what another day might bring to them.

When they had eaten their meal, both with keen appetites, Blake sprang up, with a curt "Good-night!" and swung off down the cleft. The girl looked after him with a lingering smile.

"I wish he hadn't rushed off so suddenly," she murmured. "I was just going to thank him for—for everything!"

The color swept over her face in a deep blush, and she darted around to her tiny hut as though some one might have overheard her whisper.

Yet, after all, she had said nothing; or, at least, she had merely said "everything."

CHAPTER XXII.

Understanding and Misunderstanding.

IN the morning she found Blake scraping energetically at the inner surfaces of a pair of raw hyena skins.

"So you've killed more game!" she exclaimed.

"Game? No; hyenas. I hated to waste good poison on the brutes; but nothing else showed up, and I need a new pair of pa—er—trousers."

"Was it not dangerous—great beasts like these?"

"Not even enough to make it interesting. I'd have had some fun, though, with that confounded lion when the moon came up if he hadn't sneaked off into the grass."

"A lion?"

"Yes. Didn't you hear him? The skulking brute prowled around for hours before the moon rose, when it was pitch dark. It was mighty lonesome, with him yowling down by the pool. Half a chance and I'd given him something to yowl about. But it wasn't any use firing off my arrows in the dark, and, as I said, he sneaked off before—"

"Tom—Mr. Blake!—you must not risk your life!"

"Don't you worry about me. I've learned how to look out for Tom Blake. And you can just bank on it I'm going to look out for Miss Jenny Leslie, too! But say, after breakfast, suppose we take a run out on the cliff for eggs?"

"I do not wish any to-day, thank you."

He waited a little, studying her down-bent face.

"Well," he muttered; "you don't have to come. I know I oughtn't to take a moment's time. I did quite a bit last night; but if you think—"

She glanced up, puzzled. His meaning flashed upon her, and she rose.

"Oh, not that! I will come," she answered, and hastened to prepare the morning meal.

When they came to the tree-ladder she found that the heap of stones built up by Blake to facilitate the first part of the ascent was now so high that she could climb into the branches without difficulty. She surmised that Blake had found it necessary to build up the pile before he could ascend with his burden.

They were at the foot of the heap, when, with a sharp exclamation, Blake sprang up into the branches and scrambled to the top in hot haste. Wondering what this might mean, Miss Leslie followed as fast as she could. When she reached the top she saw him running across towards an out-jutting point on the north edge of the cliff.

She had hurried after him for more than half the distance before she perceived the vultures that were gathered in a solemn circle about a long and narrow heap of stones on a ledge down on the sloping brink of the cliff. While at the foot of the tree Blake had seen one of the grewsome flock descending to join the other, and, fearful of what might be happening, had rushed on ahead.

At his approach, the croaking watchers hopped awkwardly from the ledges and soared away; only to wheel and circle back overhead. Miss Leslie shrank down, shuddering. Blake came back near her, and began to gather up the pieces of loose rock which were strewn about beneath the ledges on that part of the cliff.

"I know I piled up enough," he explained, in response to her look. "All the same, a few more will do no harm."

"Then you are sure those awful birds have not—"

"Yes, I'm sure."

He carried an armful of rocks to lay on the mound. When he began to gather more she followed his example. They worked in silence, piling the rough stones gently one upon another, until the cairn had grown to twice its former size. The air on the open cliff top was fresher than in the cleft, and Miss Leslie gave little heed to the absence of shade. She would have worked on under the burning sun without thought of consequences. But Blake knew the need of moderation.

"There; that'll do," he said. "He may have been—all he was; but we've no more than done our duty. Now, we'll stroll out on the point."

"I should prefer to return."

"No doubt. But it's time you learned how to go nesting. What if you should be left alone here? Besides, it looks to me like the signal is tearing loose."

She accompanied him out along the cliff crest until they stood in the midst of the bird colony, half deafened by their harsh clamor. She had never ventured into their concourse when alone. Even now she cried out, and would have retreated before the charp bills and beating wings had not Blake walked ahead and kicked the squawking birds out of the path. Having made certain that the big white flag was still secure on its staff he led the way along the seaward brink of the cliff, pointing out the different kinds of seafowl and shouting information about such of their habits and qualities as were of concern to hungry castaways.

He concluded the lesson by descending a dizzy flight of ledges to rob the nest of a frigate bird. It was a foolhardy feat at best, and doubly so in view of the thousands of eggs lying all around in the hollows of the cliff top. But from these Blake had recently culled out all the fresh settings of the frigate birds and none of the other eggs equaled them in delicacy of flavor.

"How's that?" he demanded, as he drew himself up over the edge of the cliff and handed the big chalky-white egg into her keeping.

"I would rather go without than see you take such risks," she replied, coldly.

"You would, eh?" he cried, quite misunderstanding her, and angered by what seemed to him a gratuitous rebuff. "Well, I'd rather you'd say nothing than speak in that tone. If you don't want the egg heave it over."

Unable to conceive any cause for his sudden anger, she was alarmed and drew back, watching him with sidelong glances.

"What's the matter?" he demanded. "Think I'm going to bite you?"

She shrank farther away, and did not answer. He stared at her, his eyes hard and bright. Suddenly he burst into a harsh laugh and strode away towards the cliff, savagely kicking aside the birds that came in his path.

When, an hour later, the girl crept back along the cleft to the baobab she saw him hard at work building a little hut several yards down towards the barricade. The moment she perceived what he was about her hearing became less guarded, and she took up her own work with a spirit and energy which she had not shown since the adventure with the puff adder.

At her call to the noon meal Blake took his time to respond, and when he at last came to join her he was morose and taciturn. She met him with a smile and exerted all her womanly tact to conciliate him.

"You must help me eat the egg," she said. "I've boiled it hard."

"Rather eat beef," he mumbled.

"But just to please me—when I've cooked it your way?"

He uttered an inarticulate sound which she chose to interpret as assent. The egg was already shelled. She cut it exactly in half and served one of the pieces to him with a bit of warm fat and a pinch of salt. As he took the dish he raised his sullen eyes to her face. She met his gaze with a look of smiling insistence.

"Come now," she said; "please don't refuse. I'm sorry I was so rude."

"Well, if you feel that way about it!—not that I care for fancy dishes," he responded, gruffly.

"It would be missing half the enjoyment to eat such a delicacy without some one to share it," she said.

Blake looked away without answer. But she could see that his face was beginning to clear. Greatly encouraged, she chatted away as though they were seated at her father's dinner table and he was an elderly friend from the business world whom it was her duty to entertain.

For a while Blake betrayed little interest, confining himself to monosyllables except when he commented on the care with which she had cooked the various dishes. When she least expected, he looked up at her, his lips parted in a broad smile. She stopped short, for she had been describing her first social triumphs and his untimely levity embarrassed her.

"Don't get mad, Miss Jenny," he said, his eyes twinkling. "You don't know how funny it seems to sit here and listen to you talking about those things. It's like serving up ice cream and onions in the same dish."

"I'm sure, Mr. Blake—"

"Beats a burlesque all hollow—Mrs. Sint-Regis-Waldoff's chop-sooey tea and young Mrs. Vandam-Jones' auto-cotillion—with us sitting here like troglodytes, chewing snake-poisoned antelope, and you in that Kundry dress—"

"Do you—I was not aware that you knew about music."

"Don't know a note. But give me a chance to hear good music and I'm there if I have to stand in the peanut-gallery."

"Oh, I'm so glad! I'm very, very fond of music! Have you been to Bayreuth?"

"Where's that?"

"In Germany. It is where his operas are given as staged by Wagner himself. It is indescribably grand and inspiring—above all, the Parsifal!"

"I'll most certainly take that in, even if I have to cut short my engagement in this gee-lorious clime—not but what, when it comes to leopard ladies—" He paused and surveyed her with frank admiration.

The blood leaped into her face.

"Oh!" she gasped, "I never dreamed that even such a man as you would compare me with—with a creature like that!"

"Such a man as me!" repeated Blake, staring. "What do you mean? I know I'm not much of a ladies' man; but to be yanked up like this when a fellow is trying to pay a compliment—well, it's not just what you'd call pleasant."

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Blake. I misunderstood. I—"

"That's all right, Miss Jenny! I don't ask any lady to beg my pardon. The only thing is I don't see why you should flare out at me that way."

For a full minute she sat, with down-bent head, her face clouded with doubt and indecision. At last she bravely raised her eyes to meet his.

"Do you wonder that I am not quite myself?" she asked. "You should remember that I have always had the utmost comforts of life and have been cared for— Don't you see how terrible it is for me? And then the death of—of—"

"I can't be sorry for that!"

"But even you felt how terrible it was—and then— Oh, surely, you must see how—how embarrassing—"

It was Blake's turn to look down and hesitate. She studied his face, her bosom heaving with quick-drawn breath; but she could make nothing of his square jaw and firm-set lips. His eyes were concealed by the brim of his leaf hat. When he spoke seemingly it was to change the subject: "Guess you saw me making me hut. I'm fixing it so it'll do me even when it rains."

Had he been the kind of man that she had been educated to consider as alone entitled to the name of gentleman, she could have felt certain that he had intended the remark for a delicately worded assurance. But was Tom Blake, for all his blunt kindliness, capable of such tact? She chose to consider that he was.

"It's a cunning little bungalow. But will not the rain flood you out?"

"It's going to have a raised floor. You're more like to have the rain drive in on you again. I'll have to rig up a porch over your door. It won't do to stuff up the hole. You've little enough air as it is. But that can wait a while. There's other work more pressing. First, there's the barricade. By the time that's done those hyena skins will be cured enough to use. I've got to have new trousers soon, and new shoes, too."

"I can do the sewing, if you will cut out the patterns."

"No; I'll take a stagger at it myself first. I'd rather you'd go egging. You need to run around more, to keep in trim."

"I feel quite well now, and I'm growing so strong! The only thing is this constant heat."

"We'll have to grin and bear it.

"I'm Fixing It So It'll Do Me Even When It Rains."

After all, it's not so bad, if only we can stave off the fever. Another reason I want you to go for eggs is that you can take your time about it, and keep a look-out for steamers."

"Then you think—?"

"Don't screw up your hopes too high. We've little show of being picked up by a chance boat on a coast with reefs like this. But I figure that if I was in your daddy's shoes it'd be high time for me to be cabling a ship to run up from Natal, or down from Zanzibar, to look around for jettison, et cetera."

"I'm sure papa will offer a big reward."

"Second the motion! I've a of idea I wouldn't mind coming a reward myself."

"You? Oh, yes; to be sure. is generous, and he will be gr to anyone who—"

"You think I mean bl money!" broke in Blake, hotly.

Her confusion told him that h not been mistaken. His face, a moment since bright and plea took on its sullenest frown.

Miss Leslie rose hurriedly started along the cleft.

"Hello!" he called. "Not going t eggs now, are you?"

She did not reply.

"Hang it all, Miss Jenny! Don't go off like that."

"May I ask you to excuse me, Mr. Blake? Is that sufficient?"

"Sufficient? It's enough to give a fellow a chill! Come, now; don't go off mad. You know I've a quick temper. Can't you make allowances?"

"You've—you've no right to look so angry, even if I did misunderstand you. You misunderstood me!" She caught herself up with a half sob. His silence gave her time to recover her composure. She continued with excessive politeness: "Need I repeat my request to be excused, Mr. Blake?"

"No; once is enough! But, honest, now, I didn't mean to be nasty."

"Good-day, Mr. Blake."

"Oh, da-darn it, good-day!" he groaned.

When, a few minutes later, she returned, he was gone. He did not come back until some time after dark, when she had withdrawn to her lean-to for the night. His hands were bleeding from thorn scratches; but after a hasty supper he went back down the cleft to build up the ne wall of the barricade with the gr stack of fresh thorn-brush that had gathered during the afternoon.

The Manner of Man.

By HARRISON SMITH.

Copyrighted, 1908, by the Associated Literary Press.

The young man who had been sitting in a corner of the smoking compartment consulting impatiently the time table and lighting cigarette after cigarette arose hurriedly as the train, a half hour late, pulled into the station.

He grasped his suit case, swung himself down from the platform before the train had come to a stop and hurried through the waiting room at a pace approximating a shambling run.

Into a waiting taxicab he tumbled, turned up the collar of his overcoat, for the evening was decidedly chilly, and gave an address brusquely to the chauffeur.

"And, look here, my son," he added, "get a hustle on. How long will it take to get me there? A half hour, eh? Well, there's a quarter in it for you for every minute you take off that half hour—see? Now let her out. Never mind the speed regulations. Take a chance!"

The taxicab hurried away, and the young man lighted another cigarette, smoking furiously and pausing only to urge the chauffeur to even better speed.

They swung into the avenue, dodged in and out amid the stream of traffic, turned into a side street, shot round a corner and stopped finally before a shabby looking brownstone house which was identical with every other brownstone house as far as the eye could see.

The young man sprang from the cab, thrust a bill into the chauffeur's palm and, mounting the steps, gave the bell a vigorous tug. Presently the door was opened by a middle aged and rather frowsy woman, who surveyed him suspiciously.

"MARGARET!" HE CRIED, HIS EYES GLOWING.

"Is Miss Evans in?" the young man demanded.

The woman's face became more forbidding. "No, she's not," said she.

"Do you know when she will be?"

"I'm sure I couldn't say."

"Very well. I'll wait for her." And the young man calmly pushed his way into the dingy little hall, lighted dimly with its single gas jet turned low.

"In here, if you please," the woman suggested, opening the door of a big, bare front room. The young man hesitated.

"Where is Miss Evans' room?" he demanded.

"Third flight, back."

"I'll go up there and wait for her," said he. And before the other could remonstrate he was halfway up the first flight.

"Three flights, back," was a dingy little side room, a veritable hole in the wall. There was but one window, which commanded an unimposing view of the littered back yards on either side of a none too clean alley.

The young man lighted the one gas jet on the wall and looked about him. Close to the window was a table—a work table evidently—covered with boxes of water colors, pencil sketches and partly finished designs on bits of academy board.

Vaguely he recognized the original drawings for fashion plates. He looked them over silently, almost reverently.

His inspection of the table finished, he let his eyes wander about the narrow room. It was decidedly cheerless, with its couch and a patent rocker of red plush. He sat down in the red plush rocker, which squeaked complainingly beneath his weight.

"Humph!" he mused. "She's plucky, all right. Imagine spending your days in a hole like this!"

There were light steps outside. The door was pushed open, and a girl stood staring at him from the doorway as if she could not credit her eyes.

She was a pretty girl, with dark eyes and cheeks at that moment decidedly rosy. She carried several parcels, two of which fell unnoticed to the floor as she gazed at the apparition in the red plush chair.

"Philip Holt!" she gasped at length. "What on earth are you doing here?"

The young man sprang up with a bound. "Margaret!" he cried, his eyes glowing. "Margaret!" He caught both her hands in his own, while the rest of the parcels slipped from her arms.

"What are you doing here?" she demanded again when she had recovered somewhat from her surprise.

"I? What am I doing?" said he. "Why—why"—

"You have broken the truce," she said severely. "The year is not up yet. Why are you here?"

He drew her into the room and gathered up the fallen parcels, while she sat down on the couch.

"I came," said he, "because—because—well, I thought you'd be glad to see me; because I imagined—had an intuition, you know, that you were living in some such sort of dingy house as this on just such a shabby street; because I had another premonition that you weren't succeeding tremendously and that you might even be living on these," he ended calmly, fishing a doughnut from one of the paper bags he had picked up and holding it out accusingly.

The girl's eyes flashed. Her lips curled. The color in her cheeks deepened.

"You had no right," she said quickly. "You are spying. You have broken the truce. You said a year, or, rather, you agreed that for a year"—

"I was a fool," said he, with conviction, "an insufferable fool, ever to be a party to such a silly agreement. I didn't realize that when you went away the place would be so barren, so utterly impossible. But I kept my mouth shut and plugged along. Then we had a streak of luck, Tom and I. We sold the Sunk Hill lode to a couple of capitalists and got close on to $75,000 apiece out of it. That settled it. Year or no year, I had to come. So I came," he finished ingenuously.

"And your promise counted for nothing," said she. "In another month the year would have been up, and then"—

"Then what?"

"You could have come without violating any promise."

The young man sat down in the red plush rocker again. In his agitation he began to swing to and fro, while its rusty springs sent out a veritable babel of discordant sounds.

"I am very glad I have violated the promise, as you choose to call it," he declared. "I expected something like this"—he waved his arms toward the four walls of the room—"when I came here tonight, but frankly nothing quite so bad.

"Margaret, how do you ever stand it—you who have had those hills out there to roam over all your life and the four winds of heaven for your playmates? What sort of cooped up life is this anyway? What are you getting out of it?"

"Well, experience, for one thing," said she.

"You'll not get much more of it," he remarked.

"Won't I?" she asked archly.

"You will not. You've had experience enough of that sort," he maintained, "you and your side room and your sketches and your impossible landlady and—and your doughnuts," he ended, with ridiculous emphasis. "You know well enough why I have come here. I telegraphed Jimmy Dean to have his mother on hand at 8 tonight sharp. I telegraphed the day I left Seavern's Buttes. I also wired him to have the clergyman picked out and to"—

"Phil," she cried, her face burning, "hush! I shan't listen to you!"

"Come without listening, then," said he. "One thing is certain—I'm not going to move one step until you promise me to marry me—not in a year nor in six months, but tonight in the Deans' front parlor, with Jimmy and his mother for witnesses."

Suddenly the girl covered her face with her hands and began to sob. Holt looked at her helplessly, his face a study of contrition.

"There, there, Margaret," he said at length, "I didn't mean to be a brute about it. I—I"—

The girl's face was lifted. She smiled through her tears.

"Phil, you stupid, blundering man," said she, "it's because—well, because I'm not sorry you broke the truce and came. Now run along and get a cab to take us to Jimmy Dean's. I'll be ready at half past 7."

Cruel Contests.

Bird singing contests for money and other prizes used to be frequent in England. Many of the little competitors, notably chaffinches, were subjected to dire cruelty on these occasions. To make them sing their eyes were pierced by a redhot needle for the purpose of completely blinding them. This was done to prevent any opposing exhibitor from frightening the birds and stopping their singing, an end which was obtained by waving some object in front of them. Blinded, the birds could see nothing, and they sang. The cruel practice has been practically stamped out by the action of the Royal Society For the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which issued numerous summonses against offenders. It may be that in some dark corner of the country the same cruelty is still practiced, but the custom as a system is now done away with.—Pearson's Weekly.

"Mumps! Good gracious! Why should they be fashionable?"

Discontent is the want of self reliance. It is infirmity of will.—Emerson.

DAY OF THE SMART

SIMPLY PRETTY GIRLS MUST TAKE A BACK SEAT.

Good Looks Will Not Overcome Bad Taste or Carelessness in Costuming—Style Has Usurped Place of Beauty.

The leading feminine question of the day is whether style or beauty gives more distinction to a woman. Beauty is always exquisite because it is very rare. If there is one beauty in a cityful of women, that city is fortunate. Beauty is like genius. One to a generation or less.

There is much prettiness in every community, but the prettiest woman of them all is apt to be miles removed from beauty. The word is often and wrongly used. Many are called beautiful, but few would be chosen by judges who are competent to judge.

Pretty women are everywhere and they are a blessing to those who look upon them, but the crying question of the day is whether prettiness without style is the equal of style without prettiness.

The balance of opinion now leans toward the latter. In simpler days, when an inexpensive frock, an ordinary pair of corsets, a rose and a sash dismissed the subject of dress, prettiness reigned supreme.

The last half-dozen years have demanded more of women. The canons of Europe are accepted over here. The girl with a radiant face, fine features and lovely eyes, who wears an ill-fitting frock over a pair of bad corsets and combs her hair in haphazard fashion, is apt to be discounted by the girl who is "smart" from heels to head.

The old question about any girl was whether or not she was pretty. The question to-day is whether she is smart looking. In some far-off period there may come a question if she is clever, but that will not be in our day.

The girl who thinks that life is made easier because style threatens to usurp the place of beauty is vastly mistaken. It is no simple task to be smart looking. It requires unceasing effort, an expert knowledge of clothes, a stylish figure and no illusions about one's looks.

The girl who would be smart looking must face the truth of her physical defects and not look in a magic mirror. She must learn to cover up these defects or accentuate them. The latter is more daring and usually the most successful method.

It is true that there are certain types of girl who can't be smart looking, but it is surprising what persistency and study and determination can do in converting a girl who has no style into one that catches the attention of every passer-by.

For the Tablecloth.

Nothing is more provoking to the careful housewife than to have a perfectly clean tablecloth literally bespattered with gravy the first time it is used.

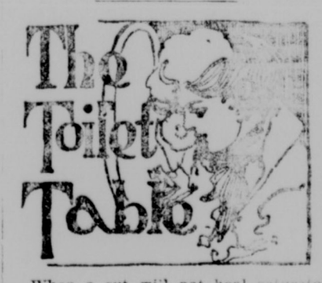
Get a large table napkin, one to match the tablecloth, if possible, and a piece of white oilcloth, cut an inch shorter and an inch narrower than the napkin.

Place the oilcloth where the meat dish will stand and spread the napkin over it.

The gravy cannot penerate through the oilcloth, thus there is a considerable saving in the washbill.

Food for Canaries.

A change of food for canaries is necessary in the winter. Boil an egg 20 minutes and mix cracker crumbs and a small pinch of cayenne pepper (a few pepper seeds will do). Give a thimbleful each day with other foods, preferably something green.



When a cut will not heal saturate a piece of absorbent cotton with cod oil and bind on.

If you have dark hair and it seems to be coming out cut off a slice of lemon and rub it in your scalp; it will stop that trouble promptly.

The application of lemon juice will sometimes cause warts to disappear. Touch them several times during the day with a camel's-hair brush soaked in the juice.

Fencing is one of the latest fads taken up by women. It is claimed to be an excellent exercise, teaching alertness and grace. Already there are many women who are experts with the foils.

When a person has no appetite and the actual eating is an effort, she can be properly nourished on liquid foods. A glass of milk, in which two raw eggs have been shaken, is a good meal. The liquid should be poured through a fine strainer and may be sweetened and flavored to taste.

Hunger makes the plainest foods enjoyable. It causes vigorous secretion and outpouring of all the digestive fluids, without a plentiful supply of which no foods can be perfectly digested. Wait for an appetite if it takes a week. Fasting is one of the saving graces. It has a spiritual significance only through its great physical and physiological importance.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1909.

JOURNALISM.

The first editorial article from the pen of ex-President Roosevelt, which appears in the Outlook, deals with "Journalism." It says in part:

Every owner, editor or reporter of a conscientious newspaper is an asset of real value to the community. We have many newspapers, big and little, of this kind. But we also have many that are emphatically not of this kind.

During the last few years it has become evident that certain newspapers are controlled by men who have gained wealth in evil fashion, who desire to stifle honest public opinion and who find an instrument in the purchased mendacity of those who edit and write for such papers.

Mr. Roosevelt then pays his respects to the "apostles of that hideous yellow journalism which defies the cult of the mendacious, the sensational and the insane." In conclusion he refers to "another type of temptation which has much fascination for men of cultivation and which is quite as fatal to their usefulness as yellow journalism." He says of these:

A newspaper which avoids vulgar sensationalism, which appeals to people of taste and intelligence, may nevertheless do them grave harm and be within its own rather narrow limits an element of serious mischief, for it may habitually and consistently practice a malign and slanderous untruthfulness which, though more refined, is as immoral as a sensationalism.

A cultivated man of good intelligence who has acquired the knack of saying bitter things but who lacks the robustness to feel at ease among men of action is apt, if his nature has anything of meanness or untruthfulness, to sit in cloistered aloofness and to endeavor by an unceasing output of slander to bolster up his own uneasy desire to be considered superior.

Now a paper edited by men of this stamp does not have much popular influence, but it may exert a real influence for evil by the way in which it teaches young men of good education that decent and upright men are as properly the subjects for foul attack as the most debased corruptionists; that efficiency and wickedness are interchangeable, and that the correct attitude to adopt in facing the problems of our time is one of sneering and supercilious untruthfulness.

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE SHOEMAKER ROADS.

Numerous complaints have been made by the gentlemen at various road meetings with regard to the roads constructed under the Shoemaker law. It is asserted that the socalled Shoemaker roads are less durable than the turnpikes, and that they rapidly deteriorate under the heavy use. The turnpike roads in Western Maryland are nearly all made with broken limestone. Limestone is too soft to stand very heavy and continuous traffic without constant attention, and the only way the turnpikes have been kept in good order and the only way they can be kept in good order is by continuous repairing. It is a fact, we believe, that every well-conducted turnpike company keeps men at work on its roads all the time, breaking stone and spreading it where there is a hole or low place, or where the stone is wearing thin. Unless this is done water will settle in the ruts and depressions caused by the wear of the wear of wheels, and as soon as water soaks through to the bed or freezes the roadbed is impaired. It is said that afor the company which owned the road from the Conococheague creek westward to Cumberland, known as the Western pike, abandoned it to the County Commissioners of Washington and Allegany it quickly deteriorated. The old National, or Cumberland, road, which was made by the United States Government in the most approved and substantial manner, almost regardless of cost, became a very bad and rough road very shortly after the United States abandoned it. The Shoemaker roads have, it is claimed, been neglected by the county authorities, and if after neglect, the surface is not as smooth as turnpikes that have been kept in constant repair it seems to be assumed that the construction of the roads is faulty. Macadam roads, says Mr. Shirley, the Road Engineer of Baltimore county, in his latest report, "should be divided into sections and a man kept constantly on each section with such tools and materials as may be necessary to repair a break in the macadam as soon as it appears, and to keep clean all ditches and drains. He should go over his section at least twice a week and after each rain" The county Commissioners, it is asserted, do not take such care as this of the Shoemaker roads, and, therefore, have no right to expect them to keep in good condition. It is only fair to the roads constructed under the Shoemaker law to judge them by the same tests and under the same conditions by which other roads are judged. The road in question is not a question for partisanship on either side, but for cool, calm common sense. What everybody wants is the best results. And to secure such results the subject must be investigated and discussed with absolute fairness—not with the purpose of upsetting or upholding anybody's theories or methods, but with the sole purpose of getting good roads.—Baltimore Sun.

THE MESSAGE.

President Taft has won universal praise for his inaugural address. The message to the people has been hailed as the keynote of his administration. It has been commended for its modesty and clearness, for its precise views of subjects admitting of exact statement and its frank and satisfactory discussion of matters less defined. The country has no doubt as to the future under the President. The factors of prosperity are all here, and disposition to exploit them is strong, in a word, capital stands at the side of Mr. Taft ready to carry his commission out into the workday world.

The effect of the message upon the money market will be increasingly gratifying, and the signs of prosperity, promoted in a multitude of ways, will bear testimony to the fact that the people are prepared to take the new President at his word. Mr. McKinley was hailed as the advance agent of prosperity. Mr. Taft is likewise its courier, only the latter has the announcement of that which is already strongly active. The short session will settle the tariff matter and give the country a tariff for taxation and revenue that will be the chart and compass of the business world. The newspapers have flattering commendation for the inaugural utterance and even those who were most vigorous in opposition to his predecessor invites Mr. Taft to have confidence in their sincere support of his administration in the directions he has outlined.

GENERAL WISH FOR A CHANGE OF INAUGURATION DATE.

There is practically unanimous demand on the press of the country for a change in the time of the inauguration of President, making it April 30 instead of March 4, so that in will fall in with the historic date of which Washington took the oath of office and at the same time be late enough to insure that the weather will be more settled than it is in the early part of March, or at least, that it will be warm. There is no reason why the date should not be postponed. It will only be necessary to amend the Constitution and lengthen Mr. Taft's term of office about eight weeks. There would be no objection to this, and we are quite certain that Thursday's experience will convince the people of this country that there is good argument for doing it.

After a similarly bad experience in 1893 Senator Hoar secured the consent of the Senate to a bill to submit a Constitutional amendment postponing the date until April 30, but the House defeated the measure. So far as we have seen, but one newspaper has found objection to the proposition. The New York Sun thinks the sort of celebration the people hold in Washington over the installation of a new President is an unnecessary display and that it would be folly to amend the Constitution in order that they might have better weather in which to hold it. The fact remains that the people, right or wrong, are going to insist upon making a holiday occasion of the inauguration. They are going to continue piling into Washington and they are going to march its streets and shout themselves hoarse. We would think a great deal less of them if they didn't. All peoples love pageantry and display, and we are no exception to the rule. Our contemporary's suggestoin that we swear in the President quietly on March 4 and then whoop things up to our hearts' content at some later and more fiting day won't do at all. Take its case at this very moment. It is celebrating the deliverance of the country from the Roosevelt regime. What fun could it get out of it three months hence? Nothing it could do or say, we are certain, two or three months later would express the sentiments that now swells its breast.

The jubilation must be when the change in administration takes place, and there is no good reason why that cannot be fixed later, when there is much less danger from the inclemency of the weather to the thousands who gather in Washington to celebrate the event.

How to Secure Trade.

The trade territory of a town is not all dependent upon the distance to neighboring trading points. The trade territory depends upon the enterprise of the merchants and the residents of the town. If a town does not reach after the trade it will come only as fast as it has to, and it will grow as it is forced to. But if the merchants go after business in the surrounding country, advertising in every possible way and making good every word of their advertising, trade will come from an ever increasing radius; the town will gain a reputation for being awake and it will forge to the front. It is the men in the town, and not altogether the men living wlthin a certain number of miles from it, that makes the town good for nothing.

TELLS OF ROADS ABROAD

Best Methods In Europe Not Ahead Of Ours, Says Major Crosby.

The State Roads Commission received Monday from Chief Engineer Walter W. Crosby a comprehensive report upon his trip to Paris last summer to attend the International Road Congress, held in that city in October. In his report Mr. Crosby discusses his observations of the roads and methods of building and maintaining them in England, Ireland and Wales. He speaks of the materials used, and the care, particularly in England, with which roads are maintained.

In summarizing his impressions of the congress and its result, he says.

"The congress was undoubtedly prompted by the evident effect of automobile traffic on the roads. The universal interest in the question was shown by the fact that 30 countries were represented by more than 2,200 delegates. The information acquired by the American delegates was perhaps not so much due to the discussions and conclusions of the congress itself as to the views presented in the papers, to personal contact and discussions with the delegates and to impressions of methods and results in the places visited.

It seems impracticable in an informal report of this nature to express in detail all the impressions I received concerning roadbuilding abroad, but as a summary of them I might state as follows:

"We did not feel on our return that the best American practice in construction is behind the foreign in any way, so far as it goes, except possibly in some details of city work (paving). Of course, the general impressions of the visitor abroad are to the effect that European roads are far better than American. This is largely due the fact that there the systems of goods road are accomplished facts, while ours are still in the making. Their work now is mostly reconstruction and maintenance, while ours is construction from the beginning, and forced construction at that. We are trying to accomplish the same, or better, results in one-tenth the time.

"The comparative excellence of foreign roads is mainly due to more careful and thorough maintenance. The organization and execution of the maintenance is far ahead and much better than that of either the United States as a whole or of any State or subdivision.

"The solution of the problems brought up by changing traffic conditions is no further advanced abroad than with us, though more actual work in this line has been completed on the road surfaces themselves.

"The establishment of a permanent international body for the accumulation of the experiences in localities is probably the most important result of the congress, and the future compilation of such experiences and the expert consideration of them extends the hope that the final solution is greatly advanced and is now not far off.

"Another lesson of the congress and of the visits to the European cities agreed upon by all the American delegates is the ultimate economy of laying only good pavements. We were impressed, as other competent American visitors have been, by the evident appreciation abroad of the importance of highway engineering. In Paris, for example, constant investigation and experiment is carried on by trained experts. The researches made in the laboratory are supplemented by experience gained in actual service, the results being carefully observed and recorded. In this way the fund of technical knowledge available for the engineers in charge of the work is great.

"While, unfortunately, the same organization does not exist to such a degree in other cities of Europe, it is everywhere apparent that the chief aim is to construct both roads and streets as well as possible. Economy of administration, management and construction is the rule, but there is no economy for the mere sake of cheapness. The chief object in view is the improvement in quality, and reduction in first cost is almost an incidental consideration.

"We returned with renewed and strengthened confidence in American methods and engineers, in itself no small thing toward successful results, and the belief that future congresses are most desirable for universal benefit, including our own."

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

District Superintendent Ward preached a very able sermon for us last night.

The winter is practically ended and we have no natural ice, but artificial ice is quoted at $2.60 per ton f. o. b. on track here, so there need be no anxiety about an abundant supply this season.

The special meetings in the M. E. church are creating considerable interest in this entire neighborhood. Tuesday night Dr. Davis preached an able sermon to a large congregation. Seven came to the altar, three of whom professed converson. Since the meeting commenced about a dozen have been reclaimed or converted, ranging in age from ten to over fifty years, and the meeting is just getting a start. The Christian people of the community are confidently expecting great results from the meeting.

Messrs. Eugene Wilson, Thomas Harris and John Wilt have spent a winter of great suffering and are sill confined to their homes.

Mr. John R. Kerfoot has been confined to his home for several weeks. He is now improving and his friends hope to see him out in a short time.

A regular boarder came to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Lee N. Hayden last week. It's a boy.

In the death of Mr. C. M. Rathbun this community has lost a consistent Christian, a sympathetic neighbor and a consciencious business man.

Mr. Thomas Hardesty assisted in our meeting Monday and Tuesday nights.

The trees in Chautauqua Park and in the vicinity of the amphitheater have been trimmed to a height of about thirty feet and the grounds are now being put in order for the coming season.

We are expecting any day the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Carr, of Fairmont; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Williams, of Clarksburg, and Mrs. Busselle and daughters, of Parkersburg.

Quite an addition has been made to Miss Annie DeBerry's cottages on Wheeling avenue.

Some changes of residence will occur in the Park soon: Mr. Chance and family will likely occupy the J. W. Feather cottage on D street and Mr. Adam Long and family are contemplating taking the Judge Sanders' cottage on Deer Park drive.

Mrs. Hennen and Mrs. Jones, of Deer Park, were in Loch Lynn Tuesday.

It is said that there are two young evangelists in Loch Lynn who may soon become famous.

The State Horticultural Society, of which Senator Brown is president, will hold its summer meeting here July 30th and 31st.

Mr. Bush Hardesty, of Loch Lynn, is confined to his house with blood poisoning. He has improved some in the last few days.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Jarboe, who spent most of the winter in Clarksburg, are back with us again.

Mr. and Mrs. Cornwall are again in their cottage on E street.

BITTINGER.

Prof. E. S. Brenneman, of our public school, is having a new pocket placed in his trousers, in which to carry candy and paragoric home to the little daughter that arrived at his home on last Friday.

Jennings Bros. have employed John Beitzel to take charge of and operate the Jefferson Broadwater farm, near this place, and which now belongs to that firm. Mr. Beitzel expects to move his family from McHenry to this place in the near future.

A number of young people serenaded Mr. and Mrs. Simon Beachy at the bride's home last week. The serenade was in honor of their recent marriage.

Mr. and Mrs. Manassa Brenneman were calling on friends at and near Grantsville this week.

Miss Huldah Stark, who has been spending the winter with her sister, Mrs. John Beitzel, at McHenry, is at home again.

Miss Fannie Brenneman went to Washington last week to witness the inauguration of President Taft, and will spend several days with friends in Baltimore.

Miss Julia Orendorf is home again, after spending a few weeks with her sister at Grantville.

Last week brought us one of the most severe blizzards of the winter and snow was drifted to considerable depth in the public high ways.

Rev. Alvin Yugel of the Lutheran church, organized a congregation at Jennings last week and is planning to build a church at that place.

GRANTSVILLE.

Prof. Cavanaugh, a talented musician of Midland, Md., and Rev. Father Brady, of West Salisbury, Pa, visited at the Hotel Castleman recently. Prof. Cavanaugh treated his friends to some very fine music.

Miss Cora Maust and her brother Myron, of Springs, Pa., visited their sister, Mrs. John Miller, Saturday and Sunday.

Miss Ruth Keller gave a Washington Birthday party to fifteen of her girl friends Monday evening. The evening was spent in playing games. At ten o'clock refreshments were served, cherries being very conspicuous, and each one was presented with a little hatchet commemorative of the evening.

Mr. Melvin Broadwater is on a trip to Pittsburg, Pa.

Mr. Menno Miller, who has been in Florida during the past winter, returned home last week.

Mr. William Winterburg paid a business trip to our county seat last week.

Mr. Jacob Miller and Miss Nellie Broadwater, administrators of the estate of the late Noah Broadwater, are closing out the merchandise in the Eagle Store at cost.

Mrs. Dr. H. L. Bevans has returned home after visiting her daughter, Mrs. Wm. Knect, of Elk Lick Pa.

Messrs Eugene Younkin, John Livengood and Wm. Shaffer caught one hundred and eighteen "suckers," weighing about seventy pounds, last Tuesday. Pretty good, boys.

Mr. John Beachy, of Chicago, Ill., who has been visiting his mother, Mrs. Aaron Beachy, has returned home.

Lives There the Man?

Lives there the man with soul so dead as to disown the wish to merit the people's applause, and having uttered words worthy to be kept by cedar oil to latest times, to leave behind him rhymes that dread neither herrings nor frankincense.—Persius.

Historic Dagger Sold.

The dagger presented to Lord Darnley by Mary Queen of Scots in the year they were married, and believed to be the one with which Rizzio was killed, was sold at Sotheby's, London, recently, for $50.

Views Hard to Condense.

The man with broad views of life cannot condense them into the narrow confines of the home.

Work of Humorous Mason.

In Lichfield (Eng.) cathedral the central pillar of the chapter-house and the clustered shafts and vaulting ribs which spread from it are very fine specimens of early English work. One of the piliars contains the quaint design of a cat with a mouse in its mouth. It is supposed to have been executed in a humorous spirit by one of the masons, who, so far as the stone permitted, made it quite realistic.

Feminine Lack of Logic.

Tell a wife that men are selfish, she will readily acquiesce. But tell that same woman that by spoiling her boys—whether in the nursery or at school, or university—she is sowing the seeds of egotism, she will give an emphatic denial.—Exchange.

Hard Task for Government.

Gin is still used as a medium of exchange in some parts of the Niger country in Africa, but the government discourages it. Owing to the extreme conservatism in these districts the task is difficult.

Less Cotton Grown in India.

Decrease in the area devoted in India to cotton culture is shown by the fact that there are 17,333,000 acres under cotton, as compared with 17,710,000 acres a year ago and 19,732,000 acres the year before that.

Immensity of the Pacific.

The area of the Pacific ocean is about the same as the earth's land area—i. e., 55,000,000 square miles.

The Real Need.

A French army officer has invented eye-glasses which enable the wearer to see behind him. What most people need is a device which will enable them to see a foot or two in advance of their noses.

Distinctions Impossible.

That which is not for the interest of the whole swarm is not for the interest of a single bee.—Marcus Aurelius.

True to Principle.

"I believe in making the little things count," remarked the kindergarten teacher as she called up the class in arithmetic.

Mr. D. H. Shank, superintendent of the Kendall Lumber Company, has been confined to his home in Oakland for more than two weeks suffering with an injury to his back and side which he received by falling from an elevated point to the railroad track, resulting in the fracture of two or three ribs and other painful hurts.

Miss Rose Coddington, who has been the guest of her sister, Mrs. Abe Lawton, for several weeks, left Saturday morning for Baltimore. Miss Coddington will go to Washington for the inauguration and from there will proceed to Rocky Mount, Virginia, where she has been engaged as milliner for the spring season.—Lonaconing Star.

We begin in this issue the publication of a series of illustrated articles entitled "Roosevelt in Africa," which will be continued weekly for a number of weeks. We are positive that these articles will prove exceptionally interesting to our readers for they give information on a subject in which the entire country is intensely curious.

Recently the attention of the State authorities was directed to conditions surrounding a Mrs. Gilpin and her four children who lived in a tumble-down shack on Water street and upon investigation it was found that things were even worse than represented. The children were without clothing and were growing up in ignorance and surrounded by the most vicious influences. The father is an inmate of the jail, being a cripple, unable to work and therefore a county charge. He made information against the woman as not being a fit person to care for the children and they were committed by Magistrate West to the Sheriff's custody who has arranged for their entry into a State institution. With the committment of the children to jail they were found to be covered with the most loathsome vermin which required unusual measures to remove. The sheriff was also compelled to have clothing made and shoes furnished the children as they were both naked and barefoot. They will be taken to the State institution provided for them within a few days by the Sheriff.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

Resolutions of Respect.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Almighty to remove from our midst by death, our esteemed co-laborer and brother, Clarence M. Rathbun, Past Grand of Virginus Lodge No. 2, I. O. O. F., who has always been held in high esteem by all who knew him, maintaining under all circumstances a character untarnished and a reputation above reproach; and

WHEREAS, Notwithstanding our irreparable loss, we bow in humble submission to the all-wise Father. We also deem it fit and proper that we manifest our grief and fraternal sympathy for the bereaved widow and family in this their hour of great sorrow; therefore be it.

Resolved, By the members of Oak Lodge No. 8 Independent Order Odd Fellows, of Loch Lynn Heights, Maryland, that we extend to our bereaved brother's family our heart felt sympathy in this the hour of their affliction and grief, and commend them to Him who said, "Come unto me, all who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" and be it further

Resolved, That in the death of Bro. C. M. Rathbun we have sustained a loss of a brother whose fellowship it was an honor and a pleasnre to enjoy; that we bear willing testimony to his many virtues; to his unquestionable integrity and stainless life, and pray that the Heavenly Father may bring speedy relief to the burdened hearts of the sorrowing family and inspire them with the consolation that "all things work together for good to them that love God," resting in the hope of meeting the friends and loved ones in the better country, where sickness, sorrow, pain and death are felt and feared no more; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the county papers, one sent to his Lodge, one spread on the minutes of our Lodge, and a copy forwarded to the bereaved family.

Respectfully submitted in Friendship, Love and Truth.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

Chief Jndge G. Semmes Hamill made his initial appearance on the bench of the Orphans' Court Tuesday morning with his colleagues Judges Moon and Kamp, when the following business was transacted:

Mr. D. Y. Morris was appointed administrator of the personal estate of Mary A. Byrne, late of Preston county, deceased.

The renunciation of the letters of administration on the estate of the late W. C. Broadwater granted several weeks ago to Gilead Broadwater, together with his petition asking the appointment of some disinterested person in his stead, was presented and upon agreement of counsel action thereon was postponed until a later session of the Court.

Jail Contract Let.

Before adjourning Wednesday afternoon, the county commissioners let the work of drawing the plans for the new improvements to be made to the county jail to Holmboe & Lafferty, of Clarksburg, W. Va.

Some days ago Messrs. Liber and Durst visited the new jail at Oakland and were so pleased with it, and ascertaining that the above firm drew the plans, wrote the firm and they sent a man on here with the above result.—Cumberland News.

If any reader of this paper knows of a neighborhood where a Sunday school should be organized, or of a Sunday school needing help, be sure to write to Rev. Ray M. Busler, Romney, W. Va., and tell him about it. Mr. Busler is the General Missionary of the American Sunday School Union and will be glad to help organize new schools, and aid in the work of schools already organized.

Mr. George D. Browning, of Swallow Falls, was in Oakland Tuesday on business. Recently Mr. Browning and Mr. R. C. McCandlish, of Friendsville, associated themselves in the purchase of a tract of timber located between Oakland and Swallow Falls, which they will begin to operate in a short time, Oakland being their shipping point. The timber consists largely of oak and is a valuable tract.

Mr. Horace R. DeWitt, of near Hoyes, came up to Oakland on last Friday and on Saturday sold at public auction several tracts of land upon which taxes were due and in arrear. He returned to his home Saturday afternoon, being accompanied by Mrs. Ella Miller, who was Mr. and Mrs. DeWitt's guest until Monday afternoon when she returned to Oakland.

The Sunday Sun under the head of "People Talked About," says: "State Senator W. McCulloh Brown recently traveled more than 250 miles from his home, in Garrett county, in order to attend the meeting of an unpaid commission of which he is a member and which lasted not more than 20 minutes. This Governor Crothers considered an instance of true patriotism."

Selling Out to Quit Business.

As I am going to Montana to locate in the spring, (not later than May 1st), am selling out my entire stock at a great reduction. A large line of watches, clocks and all kinds of solid gold and gold filled jewelry, cut glass, bric-a-brac, eye glasses, manicure sets, etc., to be disposed of. Also a good Mosler safe, weight about 5300 pounds, and all of my fixtures.

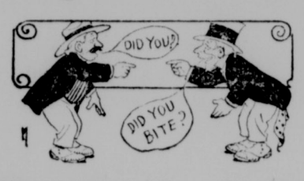
Congressmen Initiated Into Novel Club



WASHINGTON.—The most exclusive congressional organization in Washington is the "Did You Bite, Too?" club. It was formed here the other day in the cloak rooms used at the capitol. The incomplete membership list, which is withheld, contains a dozen names. Like the Ananias club, the wishes of a prospective member are not consulted. If he is considered eligible he joins because there is nothing else for him to do.

The process of initiation is something like this. A member, either of the senate or the house, receives a letter bearing the return card of a prominent down-town hotel. He opens the letter and reads it. If his face grows red and his eyes flash, it is a good indication that he is material for membership. If, after a moment of thought, a smile begins to overspread his countenance and he reaches in his desk for his check book, it is a mere indication no longer. It is a certainty. He is then approached by a member.

"Did you bite, too?" smilingly asks the member of the member-elect.

"I did," the member-elect answers, in effect.

"Haw! haw! haw!" roars the member.

The "Haw! haw! haw!" signifies that the initiation is complete, and the new member blushingly receives the congratulations of the older members immediately. If he is a good fellow he sets out to find a recruit upon whom he himself may administer the "work."

The organization of the "Did You Bite, Too?" club is the result of a visit to Washington of two women from New York in the interest of a very captivating publicity scheme. This scheme is now one of the secrets of the "Did You Bite, Too?" club.

A few days ago the young women went back to New York. The day after their departure a large bunch of letters came to the capitol, all written on the business stationery of the hotel. Each letter contained a statement of the account of the person to whom it was addressed. One was for five automobile rides, another was for dinners and suppers, another for numerous bottles of wine, others were for miscellaneous items, and one, which was received by a young congressman, who has plenty of the wherewithal and doesn't care how he spends it, was for board and lodging for two persons for one week.

Those who paid homage to these young women and wondered at the lavish entertainment are wondering no longer. The members of the "Did You Bite, Too?" club know exactly how they managed it. Now that it is all over, if you can get one of them to talk club matters he will tell you it was one of the finest pieces of high financing that ever came to his notice.

New Aero Club at the National Capital

WASHINGTON has an areo club. It was organized the other day in the office of Brig. Gen. James Allen, chief signal officer of the army at the war department. Truman H. Newberry, secretary of the navy, was elected president; Robert Shaw Oliver, assistant secretary of war, first vice-president; Thomas Nelson Page, second vice-president, and Representative Butler Ames of Massachusetts, third vice-president.

Among the charter members of the new club are Representative Parsons of New York, O. H. Tittman of the geodetic survey, Lieut. Richard B. Creery, U. S. M. C.; C. L. Mariatt, chief of the bureau of entomology; Lieut. George C. Sweet, U. S. N., of the bureau of equipment; Col. Charles H. Bromwell, U. S. A., superintendent public buildings and grounds, District of Columbia; Lieut. F. P. Lahm, George O. Totten, Jr., and R. M. McLennan.

A committee of the Aero Club of America, with which the Washington club will be affiliated, has been appointed to receive contributions for a memorial shaft to Lieut. Thomas E. Selfridge, U. S. A., who was killed in the accident to the Wright aeroplane at Fort Myer last September. On the committee are Glen H. Curtiss, Prof. Alexander Bell and Lieut. F. P. Lahm, U. S. A. The shaft will be erected either in Arlington National cemetery, where Lieut. Selfridge is buried, or on the spot where the Wright aeroplane fell on the parade ground at Fort Myer. The latter spot is favored by the majority of these interests.

Officers of the signal corps have not given up hope that something may be done by this session of congress to appropriate money for the promotion of aeronautics in the United States army. They express hope that individual members of congress may ask for money for aerial protection of the districts they represent. They believe if this should go through in one case it would be followed by other requests of a similar nature.

Victims Open War on "Mushroom" Hat

YOUNGER officers of the navy who are regularly invited to the debutantes' teas in Washington say they are going to form an anti-mushroom "Merry Widow" hat league, or wear baseball masks in the future.

It appears that the so-called "pink teas" are sometimes positively dangerous if either Miss Newberry, daughter of the secretary of the navy; Miss Olga Converse, the Misses Fremont, the Misses Goodwin or any of the other navy girls turn around too abruptly when naval officers or others of their admirers get among them and come within range of their hats.

These large hats of the mushroom "Merry Widow" species are sometimes as sharp on the edges as if they had been specially stropped, and, in addition, generally have stanch, sharp pointed feathers which protrude and could inflict untold damage if properly aimed. No one accuses the navy girls of attempting to do damage with these weapons, but the fact remains that there are several of the younger officers who have received painful glancing blows from the hats but have been too gallant to complain.

"The way the damage is done," one of the navy girls' admirers said the other day, "is generally in this fashion: You go to a tea and, after shaking hands in the drawing room, spy several of the fair young navy damsels all in a group and talking vivaciously. You approach cautiously and begin the recital of some carefully prepared speech about the weather to Miss Converse. At the sound of your voice Miss Newberry or Miss Fremont or some other navy girl turns her head quickly your way and delivers you somewhere about the face a stinging blow with the edge of her hat and the sharp pointed feathers. Of course you suffer in silence, like a man, but you silently pray for the day when softer or smaller hats will be in style."

Senate Elevator "Boys" Given a Raise

AFTER protecting President-elect Taft in the $100,000 salary voted to him recently, senatorial hearts opened up to the conductors of the senate elevators the other day and scattered a little loose change in their direction. So that now, if the house agrees, the president, vice-president, speaker, the United States judges and the elevator boys will get a raise.

The president will have $50,000 more, the judges from $1,000 to $5,000, the vice-president and speaker, $3,000, and the elevator men $200 additional a year.

Senator Borah, who insurged all along against the salary increases, first took up the cudgels for the elevator conductors. If the president's pay was to be doubled, he asserted, why not remember the hard working men who ride the senators up and down every day?

But the senate warmed up slowly.

Senator Warren coldly argued that, if the elevator men were to be benefited, a general adjustment of employes' salaries would be necessary. As proposed by Borah, the amendment was beaten.

Senator Knute Nelson of Minnesota, however, sprang the same amendment after changing the verbiage slightly. He spoke of "our poor elevator boys" who work the day long all the year round for a scanty hundred a month. Not one of the "boys" is under 60, but that did not seem to make any difference. La Follette put in an almost tearsome plea.

When the test came the second time even Warren had wilted and not a viote was recorded against increasing the "boys'" salary from $1,200 to $1,400 a year.

JUST LITERARY GOSSIP.

"What," asked the young lady, "do you think of Ibsen's view of marriage?"

"Oh-er-I don't read Russian," replied the young gentleman uneasily.

Then there was a pause.

"How," he began, "do you like Tolstoi's book on—on—?"

"Oh, why, you see, I never could enjoy French novels," she answered.

Another pause.

Then he said, "I see by the paper that Sardou is dead."

"Well, I always thought that somebody would suffer if they kept on with those aeroplanes," she answered.

The Ruling Passion.

His clothes said he was a tramp but his brow was high and his manner grand. "Madame, may I request the favor of a pair of your husband's cast-off trousers? These are somewhat passee." This, with a sweep of a tattered hat, brought results in the shape of a pair of hubby's oldest, which were just about two degrees better than those the tramp was wearing. After a critical survey of his acquisition, instead of the polite words of thanks the good woman was waiting for, the tramp volunteered with a deep, long-drawn sigh of regret: "Madam, I see your husband discards from weakness."—Puck.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

WATER DRINKERS.

Bishop Lawrence Compares Social Customs of England and America.

The bishop of Massachusetts was interviewed by the representative of The Treasury, an English monthly magazine, while he was in London, and was asked to express his views upon a number of topics.

The reporter represented him as saying that while he did not favor prohibition, "I am in favor of all national legislation tending to the discouragement of the drinking habit. With whatever faults my own country may be charged, Americans are a temperate people. In my country hospitality can be dispensed and appreciated where no alcoholic liquor is offered; in yours we Americans have the utmost dufficulty in getting any water to drink at your hospitable tables. Every kind of substitute for it, spirituous and non-spirituous, is put before us, but to offer or accept nothing but water seems to be considered outside your scheme of hospitable entertainment."

This utterance of the bishop will probably be much objected to by those who regard a dinner as very incomplete without the use of some alcoholic drinks, says Temperance, and who make a concession to what they regard as the foolish objections of some of their guests by offering some substitute, but they never think of offering water. They regard water at a dinner as being as much out of place as catnip tea.

While the bishop cannot be quoted as the antagonist of all spirituous drinks, he can be quoted as making a plea for people who do not want to use them or the substitutes sometimes offered. In the judgment of some it is far better to offer guests the bottled mineral waters and the like than intoxicants, but there are many who prefer water. Why should they not have it? One reason why it has not been offered is the dread of appearing to be mean, and another is the notion that digestion is improved by draughts of wines and the like.

Bishop Lawrence has settled one point, viz.: that it is "good form" to provide a guest drinking water at dinner if the guest prefers it, and the doctors tell us that too much liquid is taken now by most people at meals, and that all would be better off, even water drinkers, if less fluids of any kind were taken at dinner.

THE ONLY SAFE GROUND.

Total Abstainer Alone Certain He Will Not Become Drunkard.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, one of the wisest men that ever lived, though his writings (except his dictionary) were so unimportant, never uttered a more universal truth than when he affirmed of himself: "I can refrain entirely, but I cannot be moderate." It is probably at least ten times as hard to be a "moderate drinker" as to maintain total abstinence.

We are wont to lament the awful prevalence of intemperance, and it is indeed appalling; but it is not as bad now as when presidents and cabinet members habitually drank to excess, as some of them did even no further back than in the sixties of the last century. Within the memory of men and women now living, ministers of the Gospel were sometimes seen abroad in a state of intoxication, and were thought no worse of for it. That could not be to-day.

Still, it is a melancholy state of things when in our foremost clubs, in whose membership are included professional men of high standing, even clergymen, spirituous liquors figure prominently on the table. Apparently there is a widespread feeling among an excellent class of our citizens that it is "narrow" and "bigoted" to refrain entirely from wine and whisky. But it is hard for some of us to understand how such men can free themselves from a feeling of awful guilt when they see the drunkard reeling through the street and hear the agonized cries of his wife and children, declares the Christian Herald. Most men cannot go forth and give temperance lectures. Usually the most that they can do is to set a strenuous example—which should be one of total abstinence. God help us all to stamp out from our beloved land this awful curse of rum!

England's Drink Bill.

That the enormous amount of money once spent in the United Kingdom for drink is now diminishing is shown by the following figures. In 1900 there were 32 gallons of beer per head consumed. Now 27.63 gallons. In 1900 the consumption of spirits was two gallons per head. Now it is less than one gallon. Ten years ago there were 253,342 liquor shops. To-day there are 16,711 less, making 218,631 in all.

Now that this sober sensible temperance revival has begun it looks as if there would be a much greater change in the next ten years than has been seen in the past ten years. Surely a change is needed.

Prohibition Sustained in Maine.

Prohibition was an issue in the Maine state campaign, which closed with the recent election. The Republicans, who opposed the resubmission of the question of prohibition, won by about 8,000 plurality.

GOLD IN ROMANS' TEETH

Prof. Hulsen Tells Of Discoveries in The Eternal City.

That dentists were important factors in society in the days of ancient Rome and that they used gold for filling teeth, as dentists do now, was shown yesterday afternoon by Prof. Christian Hulsen, secretary of the German Achæological Institute at Rome, in the initial lecture of his course on Rome in McCoy Hall, Baltimore.

The audience which assembled in the assembly hall to listen to the distinguished foreign archæologist taxed the seating capacity of the hall to its utmost. Long before the doors were thrown open many persons had taken their stand in the corridors awaiting entrance.

This is the first visit to America by Dr. Hulsen, who is 65 years old and from what he said in his introductory remarks yesterday afternoon he is much pleased with what he has seen already. He could not say too much concerning merely the scholastic development of this new nation of the West, but also expressed great admiration at the wonderful commercial and manufacturing institutions of this country.

In his introductory remarks Dr. Hulsen spoke in the highest terms of the caliber of the work at the Johns Hopkins University, saying that without doubt it ranked in Europe as the first of American universities. He said that it was a marvel to him that a nation whose energies seemed to be put forth in such gigantic vigor after manufacturing supremacy should also find time to develop scholars of the foremost rank.

The speaker was introduced by Prof. Harry Langford Wilson, of the department of Latin and Roman archæology at the Hopkins, who is an intimate friend of the visitor, with whom he was associated in Rome several years ago when Dr. Wilson was director of the American School for Classical Studies. Dr. Hulsen, Professor Wilson said, is a great friend of American students at Rome, and is always glad to lend them a helping hand.

Dr. Hulsen said, in part:

"During the last few years the advance in excavations in the Forum has gone along with wonderful strides. The main difficulties with which we have to contend in that region is the immense pile of earth which has formed over the ancient ruins. You will readily appreciate this when I tell you that by the sixteenth century 30 feet of earth had accumulated upon these ruins. Grass and weeds of various sorts have also interwoven their roots in this mass and make it all the harder for us to dig out the buildings of ancient times.

"Even when we have reached them we have had to exercise the greatest care not to break the smaller implements and ornaments of various sorts and descriptions. Earth must be carried away in baskets. Storms of great destructiveness are and have been of frequency at Rome, and the weather has been unfavorable to the preservation of the old Roman architecture. On several occasions the Forum has been flooded. This happened in classical times and again in 1900. Several times the remains have been covered with deep snow, as was the case in 1891. All of these have had the result of causing decay to these invaluable relics of ancient civilization.

"I was much astonished in my excavations to notice a conspicuous absense of gold ornaments. I found many made of silver, but none of the more precious metal. Later on I discovered the reason for this in coming across a law which provided that gold should not be used for ornamental purposes with the exception of its use for filling teeth by the Roman dentists. Thus we see that there is nothing new under the sun and that Roman dentists were much the same as those at the present day.

"Within recent years several basilicas of early Christian times have been unearthed, notable among them that of Santa Maria Antiqua, built in the eighth century by the Christians, and in which we find a representation of Bible scenes. Among these representations we find Christ surrounded by the saints of the early Greek and Roman churches. These basilicas have been wonderfully preserved and are objects of great interest."

Dr. Hulsen is illustrating his lecture with a large number of interesting pictures which he procured during his labors of excavation.

Salt Lakes.

The Great Salt Lake is gradually drying up, and the inhabitants of Salt Lake City seem quite surprised. They ought not to be. All salt lakes owe their salinity to the fact of their having no outlet, and a lake without an outlet is a dying lake.

Nor is death usually long delayed, speaking geologically. Lakes Koko Nor and Lob Nor were undoubtedly extensive inland seas not so very many decades ago, yet Sven Hedin found them reduced to mere acrid puddles set in the midst of well nigh limitless salt deserts that once were their beds.

The terrible Taklamakan desert, too, in which Hedin nearly died of thirst, was once the bed of just such a lake. So also were the salt deserts of Persia. Northern Tibet is studded with salt lakes in process of desiccation. The Aral and Caspian seas were at one time far more extensive than now is the case, proving that they, too, are undergoing the inevitable process of desiccation to which all such bodies of water are sooner or later invariably subjected.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Long Suffering Bill.

A correspondent sends the following to a remote rural organ of the people:

"Our esteemed fellow citizen, Mr. William M. Puckleton, has had several new "No Tresspassing" signs erected on his place. We have had the pleasure of perusing the one facing the Hedgeville pike. It reads:

"Notis.—Trespasers will be persekuted to the full exten of 2 mean mungrel dogs wich ain't never ben overly soshibil with strangers an 1 dubbel barl shotgun wich ain't loaded with no sofy pillers dam if I ain't getin tired of this helraisin on my property. Yurs respecful, BILL PUCKLETON."

English in Switzerland.

A Zurich newspaper published the following advertisement in English: "Residing board house among a charming set of mountains. Very beseeming for families or singular individuals. Shadowed glades and amiable places for resting for guests of the cure. All facilities for mountainous expeditions. Excellent kitchen, with lager beer running from the tap."

The Most Dangerous Capital.

London, which used to boast of being the quietest and safest capital of the world, has become noisier than Paris and more dangerous than New York. Nearly 300 persons are now killed annually by street accidents, and how many more just escape with their lives cannot be computed.—Outlook.

Used Dolls to Set Fashions.

Long before women's newspapers were started, and fashion plates in their modern form were thought of, women derived their knowledge of the fashions from dolls dressed in modern costumes, which were sent from one country to another, more especially from Paris, which then, as now, was the leading center of the mode.

Pretty Nearly Correct.

Andreas Pellisarti, who said he lived somewhere in Mulberry street, was arraigned in the New York children's court charged with playing ball on the street. "Don't you know it "Yes, sir," sobbed Andreas. "Don't you know that you are likely to hurt somebody? The streets don't belong to you. Now tell me, son, to whom do the streets belong?" "De automobiles," answered the culprit. "Discharged," said the judge.

A Formula.

Right ideas, backed by persistence and promulgated at psychological moments, will gain a foothold and become a great force for good, no matter how determined may be the opposition.—Detroit News.

BALKING THE GRIM REAPER IN MINES

Government Experiments to Lessen Danger Meeting With Success.

In its efforts to stop the appalling loss of life in the coal mines of the country, the United States government is meeting with much success. For several months an experiment station, under the direction of the technologic branch of the United States geological survey, has been in operation at Pittsburg, Pa., with the purpose of discovering the causes of mine disasters and suggesting a remedy.

Along with the establishment of this station and the agitation which preceded the necessary legislation, there has been a falling off in the number of deaths in the coal mines for the year 1908, and while the official figures have not yet been attained, it is stated that the number of deaths will be several hundred less than in 1907, which was an unusual year. In December, 1907, four explosions took the lives of 700 men, one of them—at the Monongah mines in West Virginia—being the greatest mining disaster in the history of this country. There were 356 victims. During 1908, there were but two accidents in which the loss of life was very heavy; one in January at the Hanna mine in Wyoming, with a loss of 70 men; the other, November 28, at the Marianna mine in Pennsylvania, which resulted in 154 deaths.

Already at the experiment station two discoveries have been made which will tend to decrease the number of deaths in the mines. It has been demonstrated that a a number of the so-called "safety" explosives are anything but safe, in fact the statement is made that with the present explosives used in mining, the miner takes his life in his hand every time he touches off a fuse. It is the purpose of the government to continue these experiments until the explosives of the country are standardized in such a manner that the miner will have a definite idea what these explosives will do.

After the government has gone far enough in its experiments, a bulletin will be issued recommending permissible explosives such as stand the test. The facts learned concerning these explosives will be called directly to the attention of the state mining bureaus as well as the operators.

Perhaps the most important and far-reaching experiments so far at the station are those in which it has been definitely shown that coal dust is an explosive equally as dangerous as the deadly fire damp. This has been a mooted question among mining engineers and miners alike, both insisting that it is impossible to explode coal dust unless there is gas present. That the coal dust will explode in the mine where there is no gas has been repeatedly shown to several hundred operators and miners at the testing station. The experts at the station are now bending their energies to discover some method by which this dust can be prevented from being a serious menace to the miners. Experiments in wetting it have been going on for some time, but nothing of a very definite nature has as yet been learned, unless it is the fact that coal dust does not ignite when there is a great amount of moisture in it.

Every effort is being made at the station to come as close to the conditions in a mine as possible. The tests of various dynamites and powders used in blasting coal are being made in a mammoth boiler plate cylinder which has previously been filled with gas or coal dust. The cylinder is 100 feet long and 6 feet in diameter. Safety valves have been placed all along the top and are left unfastened in such a way that whenever there is an explosion the valves fly open on their hinges. A series of portholes on the side, covered with one-half inch glass, enables those conducting the experiments to witness the results from an observation house 60 feet away. An explosive mixture of fire damp and air, or coal dust and air, is pumped into the cylinder and the explosive which is to be tested is shot into it from one end of the cylinder, so that the flame goes right into the fire damp or coal dust. Natural gas is used at this station for fire damp because it corresponds very closely to this deadly gas. The cannon in which the explosives are placed is fired by electricity from the observation house which is parellel with the cylinder itself.

These investigations are expected to accomplish a double purpose; not only a reduction in the number of men killed in the mines, but also a saving of the waste in mining coal. The use of improper explosives, as well as the improper use of suitable explosives, results annually in the waste of great amounts of coal. The use of too high charges in blasting, or the use of unnecessarily violent explosives, shatters much good coal, converting fuel into dust which may itself be explosive and become productive of much further damage. Such explosions often loosen the roof of a coal mine, which may fall later to be wasted, or productive of fatal accidents.

In addition to the actual experiments in testing explosives, important experiments are being made in rescue work. One part of the station has been fitted up as a miniature coal mine. This is a large glass-encased air-tight room which contains difficult passages such as are found in coal mines. There are also various obstructions similar to what would be found in a mine after it had been wrecked by an explosion; also dummies weighing 150 to 200 pounds, representing asphyxiated miners. This room is filled with deadly gas and a rescue corps of men who are being trained in the work enter daily, clad in helmets which supply them with oxygen while they work. The men remain in this chamber for two hours, removing obstructions, picking up the dummies, placing them on stretchers and carrying them away. There is also in the room a machine which records the amount of work a man may be expected to do while wearing one of helmets. One-half of the large building in which this rescue room is located is used as an auditorium operators have watched the rescue drill through the large glass windows which separate the auditorium from the gas-filled chamber. Althought there has been but little opportunity so far to demonstrate its efficiency at the mines. still it has done some good work.

Once the helmeted men while fighting a mine fire succeeded in bringing an unconscious man to a place of safety, here he was given oxygen treatment and recovered his senses in a short time.

It is not the intention of the United States government to furnish rescue corps whenever there is a disaster. The present corps was organized with the idea of encouraging the mine owners and miners themselves to form a such organizations. Invitations have been issued to operators throughout the country to send picked men to the experiment station, where they may watch the government rescuers at work and later go through the same training themselves, in order that they may gain the necessary confidence in the use of these helmets. Already a number of large mining companies have taken advantage of this invitation and are organizing rescue corps at their mines, fully equipped with oxygen helmets.

In 1907 more than 3,125 men were killed in the coal mines of the country—a death rate of 4.86 for every 1,000 men employed. This is from three to four times as many men per thousand as are killed in any coal producing country of Europe, where experimental stations such as the one in Pittsburg have been in operation for several years.

COMMONEST OF FOOD ARTICLES ADULTERATED

Anything From Castor Oil to Canned Peaches Likely To Be Impure.

By Mrs. John A. Logan.

Regular readers of the bulletins issued by the board of goods and drug inspection must be a most sad and uncomfortable set of folks if they are gifted with even a little bit of imagination. These bulletins tell about investigtaions made by the food and drug inspectors and their finding that the commonest of remedies are more or less adulterated and sometimes to the great injury of the consumer. In a recent bulletin it is revealed that adulteration or some other form of fraud was found in connection with black pepper, liquid sulphur, oil of pine compound, caster oil pills, canned peaches, buchwheat flour and maple syrup.

It was certainly most seemly and fitting that the cases of buckwheat flour and maple syrup should be recorded in the same bulletin. As they were impure, so it is no more than poetic justice that they should suffer shame and ignomity when they present themselves all disfigured and bedraggled after a debauch with strange and unwelcome associates. In the case of the buckwheat an inspector bought some samples of a Baltimore product, which brazenly proclaimed to be "Self-Yeasted Mountain Buckwheat." The bulletin thus tells what happened: "A sample was subjected to analysis in the bureau of chemistry, and the results showed that the product consisted of a mixture of buckwheat and maize.

"In 'Standards of Purity for Food Products,' established under authority of the act of March 3, 1903, and published as Circular 19, office of secretary U. S. department of agriculture, buckwheat flour is defined as follows.

" 'Buchwheat flour is bolted buckwheat meal and contains not more than twelve (12) per cent of moisture, not less than one and twenty-eight-hundredths (1.28) per cent of nitrogen, and not more than one and seventy-five-hundredths (1.74) per cent of ash.'

"It was evident that the product was both adulterated and misbranded, adulterated because it purported to be a buckwheat flour when in fact, another substance, maize, had been mixed with it and substituted in part for the article. It was misbranded for the reason that it was labeled 'Buckwheat' whereas is consisted of a mixture of buckwheat flour and maize."

The Baltimore manufacturer was fined only $25.00. He ought to have been fined $2,500.

In the maple syrup case the government seized and condemned 296 cases and 93 5-gallon cans of a product labeled and branded "Canada Sap Maple and Pure Sugar Cane Syrup," and which contained sugar cane syrup in excess of maple syrup.

Isn't that a nice sort of a fraud? Just think of sitting down to our buckwheat cakes and maple syrup of a morning now and trying to feel the least bit of confidence that the cakes are not half maize and the maple half sugar cane! There is a possibility that by knowing all about buckwheat and maple syrup and by having a grocer who lives in the fear of the Lord, those who have homes of their own may get pure buckwheat and pure maple syrup; but alas for those who breakfast in hotels and restaurants! They have no chance whatever. If by some freak of fate the pure materials for this most delicious of all breakfast confections reaches the realm of the chef, how easy it is for him to scoop the maize into the buckwheat and pour sugar cane syrup into the maple! And how often he really does it, too. The pure food law doesn't go far enough. It should reach out to the table, and if it finds corn cakes there masquerading as buckwheat and corn syrup wearing the livery of maple, the landlord should be sentenced to jail for six months and fed on nothing but adulterated food.

At last we are about to have a new, suitable and sanitary building in which to house the thousands of employes of the census bureau. In has been needed ever since the bureau has been occupying the present quarters, which are dark, unhealthful and inconvenient. It is a crime to keep men and women in this black hole. It has rendered necessary the establishment and maintenance in this building at all times of a small hospital corps, with a doctor, nurse, medicines, etc. Some of the clerks have contracted diseases in the crowded, ill-ventilated rooms that has ended only in their death. Others have had to abandon their positions. Fainting spells are almost daily occurrence and few escape one or more attacks of illness during the year directly traceable to the bad condition of the office.

The old building is practically only a one-story structure covering about a half of a city block. To look at it from the outside you would say it would comfortably accommodate 500 or 600 clerks. It has "accommodated" nearly 4000.

In general outline the new building which will be seven stories high, in addition to a basement, will be stone faced to the third story, it will be brick, faced with terra corta trimmings and cornices. Besides being of steel construction, it will have a marble and terrace finish and the stairways and halls, etc. Each floor will be open clear through the majority of the usual number of partitions and offices found in buildings of this type being eliminated.

If will be erected on a portion of the site occupied by the present census office.

Conservation.

The resources of the earth are the basis of our national wealth. By means of them alone, in material things, comes leadership among the nations. The conservation movement now fully under way embraces the forest movement as one of its sources and great divisions. Thus the cause of forest conservation throughout the country has won a powerful ally and a more effective support for the work that lies just before us.—Gifford Pinchot in New England Magazine.

Aeneas and Dorcas

Sunday School Lesson for March 14, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 9:31-43. Memory verses 40, 41.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"And Peter said unto him, Aeneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; arise and make thy bed. And he arose immediately."—Acts 9:34.

TIME.—39 or 40 A. D. Three years after the last lesson. Intervening events. The conversion of Saul of Tarsus. His absence in Arabia three years (Gal. 1:17, 18). His return to Damascus. His visit to Jerusalem (Acts 22:17-21), and departure to Cilicia.

PLACE.—(1) Lydda, now Ludd, 20 miles northwest of Jerusalem in the Plain of Sharon, the old Philistine country. (2) Joppa, now Jaffa, the chief seaport of Palestine, and especially of Jerusalem, now connected with it by a railroad 31 miles long. Here Dorcas and Simon the tanner lived.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

V. 31. The story of the conversion of Paul is passed over at this time, to be taken up in the next quarter, when we begin the second division of the Acts, the work of St. Paul. To dwell on that great event here would interrupt the course of the history, and is especially fitting in connection with the beginning of his career.

"Then had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria." A bitter persecution followed the martyrdom of Stephen. It may have lasted two or three years.

The Occasion of the Peace was the trouble that fell upon the Jews in a conflict with the Roman authorities. They were so occupied with their own affairs that they had no time to persecute the Christians.

Growth by Multiplication.—The result of this daily life showed itself in their rapid increase; they "were multiplied." There are two ways to be multiplied—in numbers, and in quality and value. The disciples rapidly increased in numbers, and the aggregate of churches was greatly enlarged. Then each addition of zeal, of knowledge, of wisdom, of virtue, of spirituality, multiplies the value of each disciple and of the church. Every additional gift or virtue or talent in a man is not merely so much added to him, but is a multiplier, for it increases the value of each and every other gift. Add capital to labor, and both are multiplied. Add common sense to genius, and the man is multiplied many fold. Add to these consecration, zeal, grace, and love, and you multiply him many fold more. One note is a sound; add a score or two more and you have an anthem. One color, no matter how beautiful, is monotonous; add other colors and you have a cathedral window.

V. 32. "Peter passed throughout all quarters." Peter's first home missionary work was in connection with John in Samaria (Acts 8). They both returned to Jerusalem preaching in the village of Samaria on the way. Now we find Peter again on a Gospel tour throughout Palestine, preaching the Gospel, and healing the sick, as his credentials, and as illustrating the spirit and nature of the Gospels; visiting and encouraging and teaching the new churches formed by the persecuted Christians, and keeping them in touch with the apostolic church in Jerusalem. The accounts which follow may fairly be taken as specimens of many such journeys of progress, inspection and helpfulness.

V. 32. "He came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda." All Christians were called saints, because that was their aim and the characteristic of their lives.

V. 33. Aeneas. Very nearly the same name as Virgil's hero of Troy. "Eight years." Showing that the cure was miraculous. "Sick of the palsy." Palsy is a contraction of the word "paralysis."

V. 33. "Jesus Christ." That is, the Messiah. Peter guards against being thought the source of the healing. He draws men not to himself, but to the Saviour, and shows that Jesus is still doing the same kinds of work he did when he was living on earth. So the true preacher or teacher always draws attention not to himself, but to his Lord. "Maketh thee whole." The translation "maketh thee whole" is a very expressive term for complete health, where every part of the body is present and in perfect condition.

Vs. 37-43. The disciples at Joppa learning of Peter's presence at Lydda, sent for him to come without delay, apparently with some hope that the unseen Master would work through his disciple Peter a miracle of restoration such as he himself had wrought during his earthly life. Peter went, and like his master at Capernaum, (40) "put them all forth." Then he "kneeled down, and prayed." Then, with assurance of an answer, he "turning . . . to the body, said, Tabitha, arise." If he used the Aramaic, the common language, the expression would be Tabitha cumi, differing but one letter from the Talitha cumi of Mark 5:41, which he heard the master speak in the sick chamber of Capernaum.

V. 41. "Gave her his hand," to help her up after she was alive. Jesus took Jairus' daughter's hand.

The Teaching of This Sign.—1. It called attention to the fact that Jesus, whom Peter preached, was alive in Heaven.

2. That he was the same Jesus whose story the apostles were continually telling, and was able to do the same wonderful deeds of love he did on earth.

3. It was a sign of the reality of immortal life beyond the grave.

4. It was a symbol of the new spiritual life from the death of sin.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

A Trip to the Big Game Country

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

THEODORE ROOSEVELT has never been accused of doing things on a small scale, and when he announced his intention of traveling over 9,000 miles to risk his life in African jungle shooting no one was surprised. Such a resolve, coming from him, actually seemed commonplace, and on his return, if he escapes alive from the deadly dangers confronting him, he will no doubt be well able to describe realistically the similarity or difference between gunning for trust octopi in Washington and forest behemoths along the equator.

Never was a hunting and exploring party better equipped for its particular purposes than Mr. Roosevelt's, not only as to accouterment, but as regards the personnel of the expedition. While Mr. Roosevelt himself will be chiefly concerned in shooting and sightseeing, his son Kermit, now nineteen years old, as official photographer has peculiarly important duties, undergoing more personal risk from injury by wild animals than probably any other member of the party. The official photographer must always be in the very forefront of action afield to secure the most accurate and the most effective prints possible, and, handicapped by the bulk of his camera, he cannot possibly carry a gun in any position to be of speedy use in the many emergencies that may arise. Dr. Edgar Alexander Mearns, U. S. A., as chief naturalist assisted by Edmund Heller, the twenty-six-year-old Riverside (Cal.) explorer, hopes to discover hitherto unknown specimens of both animal and vegetable life. Professor J. A. Loring, as field naturalist, completes the scientific department. On entering the limitless wilds of the dark continent the party will be recruited up to from 200 to 450 men.

The cost of the equipment of the members of the party leaving the United States amounts to about $3,000 a man. Part of the necessary paraphernalia consists of tents, guns, ammunition, camp utensils, rations, khaki and leather hunting suits, waterproof bags for clothing, hunting boots and shoes, medical supplies, surgical apparatus, pith helmets, sleeping bags and blankets, filters, hunting and skinning knives, folding bathtubs, folding brass lanterns, bullseye lamps, candles, hot water bottles, alcohol lamps, etc.

Serviceable tents are a chief necessity. The African adventurer should have tents made of the finest green waterproof silk, free from defect to exclude poisonous insects, and the Roosevelt party is so equipped. Although each tent can be raised to a height of eight feet and holds four persons, it weighs less than one pound, including the weight of the pole, a thin telescope pole made of the best bicycle tubing.

The tents are green to escape attracting unduly the attention of roaming jungle monsters, who are frequently irritated by the glaring qualities of white materials. Rhinoceroses, for instance, have been known to charge at white tents and crush sleeping inmates ruthlessly underfoot in the dead of night, plunging headlong through entire squads of native attendants.

In the matter of guns Mr. Roosevelt is no novice. He is no mean authority on the different styles and calibers of hunting as well as purely military and target irons and their varying uses, on the peculiar differences in ammunition, on velocity, windage, range and trajectory, as well as on the intricate science of ballistics. He has chosen four types of guns for his personal use during the trip, irons suited to meet the varying conditions of a highly diversified chase. He has the vicious English Express rifle, 60 caliber, carrying a lead slug over a half inch thick and two inches long. Used at short range, this rifle's bullet strikes a blow of 3,000 pounds on an object. Mr. Elephant will usually drop dead when a ton and a half of concentrated energy hits him on the forehead. It is the weight of the shock and not the velocity or penetration of the missile that makes this weapon inhumanly effective, and, moreover, the bullet has a hole at its tip, causing the lead to spread or "mushroom" when it strikes, tearing an immense hole through a carcass. The second type of gun is a specially constructed shotgun, which is used as a rifle, for the shell used therein contains a solid lead slug instead of small shot. Accurate at short range and crushingly effective, this shotgun is used only when the animal is within fifty or sixty yards distance. Outside that zone the gun is unsafely inaccurate. Whatever living thing this bullet hits within its zone will not stop for repairs; the repair stage will have passed. The two guns mentioned are for elephants, hippopotamuses, lions and rhinoceroses. They will stop a charging behemoth when all else has failed. Tearing its way through bone or flesh, the bullet leaves a hole as large as a cocoanut where it emerges.

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE.

For long range Mr. Roosevelt has a high power, high velocity, smokeless gun, carrying soft, lead pointed, metal cased bullets that weigh 300 grains and have a muzzle velocity of 2,150 feet a second. The bullet strikes a blow of a ton and a half. This gun is used in shooting fleet footed, man shy animals, such as antelopes and colobi.

The fourth type of gun is without doubt the most valuable of the collection, as it is effective at both long and short range and is the highest type of emergency and long distance weapon. This gun is the autoloading rifle which, it is predicted, will one day arm the armies of the world. It sends a 35 caliber bullet, metal cased, lead pointed, through spring steel over a quarter of an inch thick or through forty to fifty inches of pine. The bullet weighs 200 grains and has a muzzle velocity of 2,000 feet a second, striking a blow of 2,000 pounds. In Germany the corpses of seven men were stood in a row in the positions soldiers would take, and a bullet from this gun went through five of the bodies. Five bullets fixed in a clip and placed in the chamber can be fired in a second and a half by an experienced rifleman, surely more than enough of a reserve battery to stop the wildest bull elephant tusker that ever onrushed a human assailant. This soft, lead nosed missile, only thirty-five one-hundredths of an inch thick at its base, "mushrooms" as it strikes and, passing through a body, leaves a hole as big as a man's hand at its point of egress. This is the gun that Mr. Roosevelt's head gun carrier will hand him at that moment that comes to every invader of the African jungle—the moment when a wounded elephant, lion or rhinoceros, half blinded by throbbing pain, charges or springs madly upon its assailant, whose life depends on steadiness of nerve, eye and hand, with the bloody jaws of death yawning and oncoming two or three seconds away. The recoil of this gun is utilized scientifically to eject the spent shell, cock the rifle and simultaneously reload it. Forty per cent of the recoil is thus utilized in much the same manner that the recoil of the sixteen inch disappearing gun in forts is used to carry the cannon back to be reloaded and resighted. A special autoloading gun with gold sights and mountings has been manufactured for Mr. Roosevelt's exclusive use.

A more varied itinerary for a vacation trip than Mr. Roosevelt's is rarely seen—New York to Naples, the Mediterranean route, the steamers following which stop at the Azores and Gibraltar; then a two day run along the shores of Spain, passing close to the Balearic islands of Ivica, Minorca, Majorca and later historic Sardinia; then open water northeastward to the vine covered slopes of Capri, from whose lofty heights for years the notorious Tyrrhenian pirate chiefs spied and swooped down upon the richly laden craft plying to and from the neighboring bay of Naples.

Changing at Naples in a few hours from the North German Lloyd steamer to one of the German East African company, the 1,500 mile slant past the sulphur cliffs of Sicily and across the Mediterranean to Alexandria will further interest the notable American party. In four days they will be ashore in the land of the Ptolemies, the Egyptian land of mystery, the land that was old when ancient Rome was new. But the one time city of Alexander the Great, Pompey's pillar and the Pharos light must swiftly pass, as also the interesting Nile delta, dingy, dirty, degenerate Port Said and the Suez canal, for southward and eastward the course of Mr. Roosevelt's empire takes its way down the Red sea, south through the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, Arabia in view on the left, Abyssinia on the right, eastward again through the gulf of Aden. Those dark, hazy heights on the south shore are the Ingali mountains of British Somali.

Now comes another shift of the course—southward around the hidden rock ribs of Ras Alula and the treacherous Cape Guardafui, on Somaliland, where full many a gallant ship and her gallant men have disappeared. On rounding the cape the waters of the typhoon swept Indian ocean spread on every side. It is now a south and a south by west run of 1,500 miles to one of the preliminary objective points of the expedition, Mombasa, the romance clustered capital of the protectorate of British East Africa, a total of about seventeen days from Naples. It is in Kilindini harbor that the party disembarks, the port nearest Mombasa, the medieval seaport fortified in 1593 by the Portuguese.

Mombasa, on the coral island, connected with the mainland by a bridge, is the terminus of the celebrated Uganda railway, built by the British government at a cost of $24,000,000 to tap and develop the vast and richly productive East African protectorate.

Loading their immense bulk of supplies and equipment on a specially arranged train and obtaining a part of their retinue of native helpers required in the wilderness, members of the Roosevelt party will now tingle with excitement, for the magic door of the big game treasure house is swinging open.

Port Florence, 584 miles to the west by north, on Lake Victoria Nyanza, becomes the second preliminary objective point, for it is there that the railway ends, and a steamer takes the party across the majestic queen of the African lakes to the very heart of the big game hunting region, to Uganda on the plateau of which country the principal hunting is to be done. But there is much to do before reaching Port Florence, for en route along the railway is the Nairobi district, where Mr. Roosevelt gets his first shot at elephants, lions, hippos and rhinos on the 50,000 acres of William McMillan, nephew of the late United States Senator McMillan of Michigan.

However, Mr. Roosevelt will see the jungle monsters in their haunt before he reaches Nairobi, for the Uganda railway route traverses primordial fastnesses where many of the specimens of game his license allows him to shoot can be seen from the car.

The railway journey to Port Florence is in itself well worth an African trip. Rising from the unwholesome coast, the train reaches an altitude of over 7,000 feet, crossing valleys and winding around mountain heights, affording rarest views of great peaks and sweeps of country. At Londiani the road is 7,400 feet above sea level. An inspiring view of Mount Kilimanjaro, about 19,000 feet high, is revealed, its lofty top crowned with everlasting snows despite its closeness to the equator, distant only three degrees northward.

Aeneas and Dorcas

Sunday School Lesson for March 14, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 9:31-43. Memory verses 40, 41.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"And Peter said unto him, Aeneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; arise and make thy bed. And he arose immediately."—Acts 9:34.

TIME.—39 or 40 A. D. Three years after the last lesson. Intervening events. The conversion of Saul of Tarsus. His absence in Arabia three years (Gal. 1:17, 18). His return to Damascus. His visit to Jerusalem (Acts 22:17-20), and departure to Cilicia.

PLACE.—(1) Lydda, now Ludd, 20 miles northwest of Jerusalem in the Plain of Sharon, the old Philistine country. (2) Joppa, now Jaffa, the chief seaport of Palestine, and especially of Jerusalem, now connected with it by a railroad 31 miles long. Here Dorcas and Simon the tanner lived

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

V. 31. The story of the conversion of Paul is passed over at this time, to be taken up in the next quarter, when we begin the second division of the Acts, the work of St. Paul. To dwell on that great event here would interrupt the course of the history, and is especially fitting in connection with the beginning of his career.

"Then had the churches rest Gk. and R. V. 'peace' throughout" the whole province of Palestine, consisting of "Judea and Galilee and Samaria." A bitter persecution followed the martyrdom of Stephen. It may have lasted two or three years.

The Occasion of the Peace was the trouble that fell upon the Jews in a conflict with the Roman authorities. They were so occupied with their own affairs that they had no time to persecute the Christians.

Growth by Multiplication.—The result of this daily life showed itself in their rapid increase; they "were multiplied." There are two ways to be multiplied—in numbers, and in quality and value. The disciples rapidly increased in numbers, and the aggregate of churches was greatly enlarged. Then each addition of zeal, of knowledge, of wisdom, of virtue, of spirituality, multiplies the value of each disciple and of the church. Every additional gift or virtue or talent in a man is not merely so much added to him, but is a multiplier, for it increases the value of each and every other gift. Add capital to labor, and both are multiplied. Add common sense to genius, and the man is multiplied many fold. Add to these consecration, zeal, grace, and love, and you multiply him many fold more. One note is a sound; add a score or two more and you have an anthem. One color, no matter how beautiful, is monotonous; add other colors and you have a cathedral window.

V. 32. "Peter passed throughout all quarters." Peter's first home missionary work was in connection with John in Samaria (Acts 8). They both returned to Jerusalem preaching in the village of Samaria on the way. Now we find Peter again on a Gospel tour throughout Palestine, preaching the Gospel, and healing the sick, as his credentials, and as illustrating the spirit and nature of the Gospels; visiting and encouraging and teaching the new churches formed by the persecuted Christians, and keeping them in touch with the apostolic church in Jerusalem. The accounts which follow may fairly be taken as specimens of many such journeys of progress, inspection and helpfulness.

V. 32. "He came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda." All Christians were called saints, because that was their aim and the characteristic of their lives.

V. 33. Aeneas. Very nearly the same name as Virgil's hero of Troy. "Eight years." Showing that the cure was miraculous. "Sick of the palsy." Palsy is a contraction of the word "paralysis."

V. 33. "Jesus Christ." That is, the Messiah. Peter guards against being thought the source of the healing. He draws men not to himself, but to the Saviour, and shows that Jesus is still doing the same kinds of work he did when he was living on earth. So the true preacher or teacher always draws attention not to himself, but to his Lord. "Maketh thee whole." The translation "maketh thee whole" is a very expressive term for complete health, where every part of the body is present and in perfect condition.

Vs. 37-43. The disciples at Joppa learning of Peter's presence at Lydda, sent for him to come without delay, apparently with some hope that the unseen Master would work through his disciple Peter a miracle of restoration such as he himself had wrought during his earthly life. Peter went, and like his master at Capernaum, (40) "put them all forth." Then he "kneeled down, and prayed." Then, with assurance of an answer, he "turning . . . to the body, said, Tabitha, arise." If he used the Aramaic, the common language, the expression would be Tabitha cumi, differing but one letter from the Talitha cumi of Mark 5:41, which he heard the master speak in the sick chamber of Capernaum.

V. 41. "Gave her his hand," to help her up after she was alive. Jesus took Jairus' daughter's hand.

The Teaching of This Sign.—1. It called attention to the fact that Jesus, whom Peter preached, was alive in Heaven.

2. That he was the same Jesus whose story the apostles were continually telling, and was able to do the same wonderful deeds of love he did on earth.

3. It was a sign of the reality of immortal life beyond the grave.

4. It was a symbol of the new spiritual life from the death of sin.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

A Trip to the Big Game Country

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

THEODORE ROOSEVELT has never been accused of doing things on a small scale, and when he announced his intention of traveling over 9,000 miles to risk his life in African jungle shooting no one was surprised. Such a resolve, coming from him, actually seemed commonplace, and on his return, if he escapes alive from the deadly dangers confronting him, he will no doubt be well able to describe realistically the similarity or difference between gunning for trust octopi in Washington and forest behemoths along the equator.

Never was a hunting and exploring party better equipped for its particular purposes than Mr. Roosevelt's, not only as to accouterment, but as regards the personnel of the expedition. While Mr. Roosevelt himself will be chiefly concerned in shooting and sightseeing, his son Kermit, now nineteen years old, as official photographer has peculiarly important duties, undergoing more personal risk from injury by wild animals than probably any other member of the party. The official photographer must always be in the very forefront of action afield to secure the most accurate and the most effective prints possible, and, handicapped by the bulk of his camera, he cannot possibly carry a gun in any position to be of speedy use in the many emergencies that may arise. Dr. Edgar Alexander Mearns, U. S. A., as chief naturalist assisted by Edmund Heller, the twenty-six-year-old Riverside (Cal.) explorer, hopes to discover hitherto unknown specimens of both animal and vegetable life. Professor J. A. Loring, as field naturalist, completes the scientific department. On entering the limitless wilds of the dark continent the party will be recruited up to from 200 to 450 men.

COPYRIGHT BY UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD

COMING EVENTS CAST LONG SHADOWS BEFORE.

The cost of the equipment of the members of the party leaving the United States amounts to about $3,000 a man. Part of the necessary paraphernalia consists of tents, guns, ammunition, camp utensils, rations, khaki and leather hunting suits, waterproof bags for clothing, hunting boots and shoes, medical supplies, surgical apparatus, pith helmets, sleeping bags and blankets, filters, hunting and skinning knives, folding bathtubs, folding brass lanterns, bullseye lamps, candles, hot water bottles, alcohol lamps, etc.

Serviceable tents are a chief necessity. The African adventurer should have tents made of the finest green waterproof silk, free from defect to exclude poisonous insects, and the Roosevelt party is so equipped. Although each tent can be raised to a height of eight feet and holds four persons, it weighs less than one pound, including the weight of the pole, a thin telescope pole made of the best bicycle tubing.

The tents are green to escape attracting unduly the attention of roaming jungle monsters, who are frequently irritated by the glaring qualities of white materials. Rhinoceroses, for instance, have been known to charge at white tents and crush sleeping inmates ruthlessly underfoot in the dead of night, plunging headlong through entire squads of native attendants.

In the matter of guns Mr. Roosevelt is no novice. He is no mean authority on the different styles and calibers of hunting as well as purely military and target irons and their varying uses, on the peculiar differences in ammunition, on velocity, windage, range and trajectory, as well as on the intricate science of ballistics. He has chosen four types of guns for his personal use during the trip, irons suited to meet the varying conditions of a highly diversified chase. He has the vicious English Express rifle, 60 caliber, carrying a lead slug over a half inch thick and two inches long. Used at short range, this rifle's bullet strikes a blow of 3,000 pounds on an object. Mr. Elephant will usually drop dead when a ton and a half of concentrated energy hits him on the forehead. It is the weight of the shock and not the velocity or penetration of the missile that makes this weapon inhumanly effective, and, moreover, the bullet has a hole at its tip, causing the lead to spread or "mushroom" when it strikes, tearing an immense hole through a carcass. The second type of gun is a specially constructed shotgun, which is used as a rifle, for the shell used therein contains a solid lead slug instead of small shot. Accurate at short range and crushingly effective, this shotgun is used only when the animal is within fifty or sixty yards distance. Outside that zone the gun is unsafely inaccurate. Whatever living thing this bullet hits within its zone will not stop for repairs; the repair stage will have passed. The two guns mentioned are for elephants, hippopotamuses, lions and rhinoceroses. They will stop a charging behemoth when all else has failed. Tearing its way through bone or flesh, the bullet leaves a hole as large as a cocoanut where it emerges.

For long range Mr. Roosevelt has a high power, high velocity, smokeless gun, carrying soft, lead pointed, metal cased bullets that weigh 300 grains and have a muzzle velocity of 2,150 feet a second. The bullet strikes a blow of a ton and a half. This gun is used in shooting fleet footed, man shy animals, such as antelopes and colobi.

APPLE GROWING INDUSTRY PROMISES GREAT RETURNS

Many Farmers in Preston County, W. Va., Engaging in the Business.

In the last issue of the Preston Republican, published at Terra Alta, W. Va., there appeared the subjoined article on the apple growing industry to the possibilities of which the farmers of that county are becoming enthusiastic. As the natural conditions of that county are about the same as those obtaining here we republished the article in full as follows:

Scores of Preston county farmers are preparing to set out apple trees this spring, some on a small scale and some to plunge into the fruit growing business in earnest. Besides the regular farmers, numerous Terra Altans who own land are virtually covering their holdings with trees. The experience of generations, and the scientific investigations of expert fruit men, have proved conclusively that the highlands of the county are well adapted to apple production, and for several years men of means have been taking an interest in the industry. It is estimated that from eighteen thousand to twenty-five thousand trees have been set out within three years.

George W. Southern & Sons, the nurserymen of Clarksburg, have for more than a decade watched the apple production of the Allegheny tops. Three or four years ago they began to acquire land suitable for apple production near here, and now they own about a thousand acres and are planting it at the rate of a thousand trees a year.

The Southerns have declared their intention of erecting a large cold storage plant at Terra Alta for the storing of apples. Federal and State experiments have shown that apples may be kept indefinitely in proper quarters. The storage house will be built in town, where apple growers of the country round may bring their fruit as soon as it is picked. Apples so stored, in an unvarying temture, have been found in perfect tion many months after picking, ile similar fruit, buried or otherwise improperly cared for, rotted in a very short time.

The erection of a cold storage plant will mean the expenditure of a large sum of money, and the Southerns have it to spend. Their faith in this section is great, for they have not leaped blindly. Within seven years they mean to have the enormous number of forty thousand apples trees set out on their own ground.

Among the local men who have looked into the prospects and decided to raise fruit are J. S. Lakin, Wesley DeBerry, W. M. Bishop, O. C. Crane, E. B. Hauger, C. A. Miller and Charles Trembly. These men have probably eight thousand trees now out and some of them will plant more this year. W. E. Crane, on his land near Corinth, will set out a thousand more trees this year, and Mr. Trembly, on his land in Crab Orchard will put out at least five hundred more.

This part of Preston county is said by many experienced fruitmen to be the best in West Virginia for several reasons. The fame of Preston county apple flavor is wide. There is no part of the earth that produces apples of a finer flavor. It is perhaps true that parts of the northwest will raise larger apples, but when the discriminating consumer sinks his teeth into them he finds them rather tasteless. They are pretty, but apple eaters want something more than beauty as a general rule.

Then the higher altitudes are free from several tree pests which afflict other sections. The San Jose scale is not prevalent here, which is a wonderful advantage. Apple crops in Preston county are as regular as anywhere else. It is a fact that old neglected orchards often fail to bring forth their fruits, but it is a fact that any crop, neglected will often prove a failure. Modern orchardists have learned of many ways to overcome the hindrances of nature. It is possible to hasten or restrain the budding of trees in the springtime, in a great measure to prevent the appearance of worms in the fruit, and to delay or quicken the ripening of the apples in the fall. The United States Agriculture Department, at Washington, will gladly furnish, free, to any farmer or citizen bulletins concerning the profitable culture of fruits. It is only necessary to address the Department and ask for a free catalogue of "Farmers' Bulletins," and it will be sent at once. From this catalogue the citizen may order whatever bulletins interest him. These publications are not the theories of some fellows who had nothing to do but write a little piece about fruit growing, but are the practical experiences of scientific men who have spent years in the study of the subjects of which they treat.

The fact that this community has been quite thickly populated for generations without the development of the apple industry proves nothing more than that the industry has not been pushed. Many farmers have large orchards and usually if they have a hundred trees they have about fifty-seven varieties. This is very well, if the farmer wants to use all his apples, but if he wants to sell them he must have sufficient of one kind to interest a big buyer, otherwise he will have to depend solely on local demand. When the time comes, which it soon will, that tens of thousands of apple trees are in bearing near here, Terra Alta will be considered a great apple market and buyers will come from the large population centres and buy the apples on the trees, put a force of men to picking them, and pay the orchardist the cash.

The principal varieties now being set out around here are York Imperials, Roman Beauties and Baldwins, though there are other kinds that have many advocates. These apples are of good size and shape, and they have, when raised in the wholesome surroundings of the Preston county mountains, most delicious flavors.

That this section will soon be a great fruit country is certain, and is means that hundreds of farmers and land owners will have the opportunity of making money out of industry. The more trees set out, the better for every one. There is no danger of overstocking the markets, for as the production increases the selling zone will widen. Local men of business ability and judgment have unlimited faith in the movement. There is no reason why every farmer should not investigate for himself, and, if he finds the business promises profit, plant a lot of trees this year.

TAFT WARNS OF BIG DEFICIT IN HIS FIRST MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

WASHINGTON, March 16.—President Taft's message to Congress today follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives—I have convened the Congress in this extra session in order to enable it to give immediate consideration to the revision of the Dingley tariff act. Conditions affecting production, manufacture and business generally have so changed in the last 12 years as to require a readjustment and revision of the import duties imposed by that act.

MORE THAN THIS, THE PRESENT TARIFF ACT, WITH THE OTHER SOURCES OF GOVERNMENT REVENUE DOES NOT FURNISH INCOME ENOUGH TO PAY THE AUTHORIZED EXPENDITURES. BY JULY 1 NEXT THE EXCESS OF EXPENSES OVER RECEIPTS FOR THE CURRENT FISCAL YEAR WILL EQUAL $100,000,000.

The successful party in the late election is pledged to a revision of the tariff. The country, and the business community especially, expect it. The prospect of a change in the rates of import duties always causes a suspension or halt in business because of the uncertainty as to the changes to be made and their effect.

It is therefore of the highest importance that the new bill should be agreed upon and passed with as much speed as possible consistent with its due and thorough consideration. For these reasons I have deemed the present to be an extraordinary occasion, within the meaning of the Constitution, justifying and requiring the calling of an extra session.

In my inaugural address I stated in a summary way the principles upon which, in my judgment, the revision of the tariff should proceed, and indicated at least one new source of revenue that might be properly resorted to in order to avoid a future deficit. It is not necessary for me to repeat what I then said.

I VENTURE TO SUGGEST THAT THE VITAL BUSINESS INTERESTS OF THE COUNTRY REQUIRE THAT THE ATTENTION OF THE CONGRESS IN THIS SESSION BE CHIEFLY DEVOTED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF THE NEW TARIFF BILL, AND THAT THE LESS TIME GIVEN TO OTHER SUBJECTS OF LEGISLATION IN THIS SESSION, THE BETTER FOR THE COUNTRY. WILLIAM H. TAFT.

BUYS BIG LUMBER TRACT

Croft Lumber Company Secure 20,000 Acres.

The Croft Lumber Company, composed of Messrs. S. A. Kendall, J. L. Kendall and J. H. Henderson, members of the Kendall Lumber Company, and the Yough Manor Lumber Company, of Pittsburg, Pa.; N. U. Bond, of the Dubois & Bond Bros. Lumber Company, of Garrett county, Maryland, and J. Gibson McIlvain, Hugh McIlvain and Walter B. McIlvain, lumbermen of Philadelphia, Pa., have purchased 20,000 acres of timber land near Pickins, W. Va., extending back a distance of 20 miles, the greater part of which is virgin forest. It consists of white spruce, hemlock and hardwood, and is estimated to cut 175,000,000 feet.

They have also within the last few days let the contract for the erection of a double band mill of the latest improved pattern, with a daily capacity of 150,000 feet. They expect to begin operations by August 1.

This will make one of the largest lumber operations of the State. The lumber will be shipped over the Western Maryland railroad, which traverses a part of the timber tract, and with the completion of a short branch road the entire tract of timber will be easily accessible to the above named railroad

Mr. N. U. Bond was elected general manager of the Croft Lumber Company at a meeting of the stockholders held at Crellin on Saturday of last week.

JUDGE FAIRALL DIES IN IOWA

Member of Prominent Family of Garrett County.

Judge Samuel M. Fairall died on the 8th day of March, in Iowa City, aged 74 years. He was the oldest son of Truman and Mary Fairall, originally from Prince George's county, of this State. The son was born in 1835 at the Little Meadows, in Garrett county. The father then kept the historic Tomlinson Stone House Hotel. The Fairall family consisted of ten children, about equally divided in the sex. They were all carefully educated by the ambitious parents. Samuel's education was begun at a nice private school on the Fairall premises. For a time he was a student at the Allegany Academy, thence to Washington College, Pa. where a full education was completed.

The Fairall family left old Allegany county in 1864, and moved to Iowa, the subject of this sketch going in advance.

He readily betook himself to the law and made a success at it. He was chosen to a number of responsible offices. Among the offices ably filled by him was law judge at Iowa City, of the State of Iowa. After his judicial term expired, he returned to the law practice, and continued at it to the end of his life.

The Allegany county centennial of 1890 drew him hither from his western to his native home, which he had not seen for a quarter of a century. The enjoyment was full; the contributor had a share. The schoolboy days and times of 1841 were revived. He had a bright, perceptive and resourceful mind, with a memory sufficient to keep in a mental store its large contents. By nature and cultivation he was of a sociable and genial disposition. Had great popularity, which was many times shown by his election to office against adverse party majorities. He was of the old Democratic party.

He leaves a family of children, but no widow. Had many near relative here and in the west. Mrs. Dr. Carr and Richard Fairall, of Cumberland, are cousins. The Fairall name has been prominent in Allegany and Garrett counties for several generations.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

March 13, 1909.

Taken to a Baltimore Hospital.

Christian Beachy, a son of Aaron Beachy, of Grantsville, met with a painful and serious accident while hauling logs for the Cook Lumber Co., of Unamis, by having his left ankle broken and crushed. He was sitting an a load of logs when the logs slipped, crushing and breaking his left ankle. The doctors at Grantsville dressed the injured limb and made him as comfortable as possible. He was taken to the hospital at Baltimore on Friday last to receive treatment.

ARRESTED ON CHARGE OF THEFT

George Croston and Son Taken Under Warrant and Lodged in Jail.

Last Friday afternoon George Croston and his son, a young man about twenty years of age, were arrested at their home near Boiling Springs, Deer Park district, by Deputy Sheriff Brown upon a warrant sworn out by Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill charging them with having taken the sash from five windows in the house on the George Male farm near Deer Park and converted them to their use by fitting the sash into the windows of their own dwelling.

The two men were brought to Oakland by the sheriff and lodged in jail until Saturday morning when the elder Croston was given a preliminary hearing on the charge and was released on bond. The young man had his hearing postponed until he could have witnesses summoned and was also released upon bond.

Croston, it is alleged, stated that he took the sash but intended paying for them at some future date.

Do the Railroads of the Country Deserve this Treatment.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Ever since the panic, and for a considerable period previous thereto, various legislative bodies have seemingly vied with each other in the adoption of legislation against railroads—legislation of hostile character.

This action of state legislatures and municipalities in different parts of the country has had a very depressing effect on business, and while effecting railroads, has in turn greatly disturbed communities, for with lessened business by the railroads men in large numbers have been furloughed naturally and merchants in towns and cities have also found it necessary to retrench.

In Baltimore city, where families of railroad men occupy dwellings, this enforced idleness on the part of the heads of families has caused many to give up their rented houses, taking portions of dwellings with other families, thus placing on the market numerous additional houses for rent.

The introduction of a two cent a mile bill in the Legislature of one state has had a tendency to cause the presentation of bills of similar character in adjoining states, and this, too, without the framers of these measures consulting passenger officials of railroads to obtain their views in advance.

The railroads knowing full well that the adoption of such legislation would have a disastrous effect upon their revenues and business generally, have rebelled, demanding hearings and stating to legislative committees that such bills, if passed, would have a bad effect, driving them into bankruptcy and ruin.

In some cases these exceptions to such railroad hostility have been accepted, but in the main the corporations have received very little redress and have suffered accordingly.

The Baltimore Sun in its issue of March 10th, printed an editorial on the subject of "Hostile Railroad Legislation a Menace to Prosperity," and every railroad man and legislator should have a copy of the paper and give it thoughtful perusal.

The article was based on the decision of Judge McPherson of the United States District Court of Iowa, declaring the railroad legislation in Missouri, both on freight and passengers, invalid. The Governor and Attorney General of Missouri, it is asserted, will not accept Judge McPherson's decision, but will appeal to the higher courts. This proposed action the Sun regarded as unfortunate and ventures the opinion that it would be more judicious and tend to restore prosperity if the Missouri officials would accept Judge McPherson's decision, and cease harrying the railroads with hostile legislation.

It says that the Burlington Railroad has issued a statement, showing that in eleven States through which its line passes eight hundred railroad laws have been enacted in the past two years, and that two hundred and seventy-two more bills of a similar character are now waiting action.

The Burlington Company, its says, in 1907 spent sixteen million dollars in betterments and money spent in this way nearly all goes for labor—labor on the tracks and bridges, and in the steel and lumber mills. In the year just closed, the Sun says, the Burlington Company only spent one millions dollars in betterments, showing a loss of fifteen million dollars last year to labor.

Proper legislation, it says, will be sustained by the calm judgment of the whole people, but the sober second thought of the country will not sustain a reckless crusade which ignores facts and business conditions, and which tends to block the road of returning prosperity.

CANNON MADE SPEAKER FOR FOURTH TIME

Full Slate Goes Through With Small Insurgent Opposition.

Washington, D. C., Mar. 15.—The House of Representation for the Sixty-first Congress organized today with the re-election of Joseph G. Cannon as Speaker and the re-election of the officers of the last Congress. Only twelve men elected to the House as Republicans refused to abide by the choice of the Republican caucus for Speaker. This dozen scattered their votes among other Republican candidates put forward by them.

The Democrats stood solidly for their candidate, Champ Clark. The vote resulted, Cannon, 204; Clark, 166; Cooper, 8; Norris, 2; Esch, 1; Hepburn, 1.

When the hour of noon arrived the galleries of the House were packed to their capacity with visitors admitted by card to witness the opening of the Sixty-first Congress in extraordinary session. The larger part of the audience were ladies, members of the families and friends of the new representatives to take their seats today and the old members who had been re-elected. On the floor the scene was one of animation. Members gathered in little groups and eagerly discussed the progress of the fight.

As the hands of the clock drew near to 12 members ranged themselves in seats wherever they found vacancies. The Democrats occupied the side they were accustomed to, and the Republicans chose their side. The clerk of the House, Maj. McDowell, called the House to order and read the proclamation of President Taft convening the extra session. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Henry N. Couden, chaplain of the House. The roll was then called by states to register the attendance of the members. As soon as this was concluded it was announced that the election of Speaker was next in order.

Without preliminary flourish Mr. Currier, of New Hampshire, nominated Joseph G. Cannon for Speaker. The motion was a signal for vociferous applause on the Republican side. Representative Clayton of Alabama nominated Champ Clark of Missouri. The Democrats greeted his name with cheers. With further ceremony the roll was called for the speakership contest.

When the result was announced—204 for Cannon and 166 for Clark—there was an outbreak of applause from the Republican side. Clerk McDowell appointed Messrs. Clark of Missouri and Campbell and Bartlett to escort the newly elected Speaker to the chair. When the Speaker, escorted by these gentlemen, entered the House by the main entrance and walked down the centre aisle the Republican side jumped to its feet and cheered. Many insurgents joined in the applause just by way of showing there was nothing personal in their attitude. Champ Clark led the Speaker up to his big chair and then briefly addressed the House.

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you the second man in the history of this country to be elected Speaker of the House for four consecutive terms—Joseph G. Cannon of Illinois."

Of course, there was more cheering at this. When it had ended the Speaker read a brief speech he had already prepared for the occasion.

In the final vote in the House this afternoon on the adoption of the rules, sufficient changes were more from the vote on the adoption of the previous question to turn victory to the insurgents, who want to revise the rules. The vote was 189 to 193 against the adoption of the rules of the previous House. On this roll call, the Speaker himself voted. He shouted "Aye," when his name was called.

Costly Drink.

Mr. and Mrs. William Finerty, of Jenningston, W. Va., after toiling in a Mountain State lumber camp for years, managed to save jointly $1,200. With his wife Finerty took his hoardings to Pittsburg, where he registered at a hotel on Water street opposite the B. & O. Depot, and then went over to the North Side to rent living quarters. He went into a Federal street saloon and knew nothing until several hours later, when he found himself in the middle of the street with only a few pennies about him. Mrs. Finerty, in putting the police on the case, said that since her husband suffered an attack of brain fever some years ago, a few drinks caused a lapse of memory.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preserver of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.—Miss Leslie was attacked by a poisonous snake. Blake killed it and saved its poison to kill game.

CHAPTER XVIII.—For the second time Winthrope was attacked by fever. He and Blake disagreed.

CHAPTER XIX.—Blake made a strong door for the private compartment of Miss Leslie's cave-home. A terrible storm raged that night. Winthrope stole into her room, but she managed to swing her door closed in time.

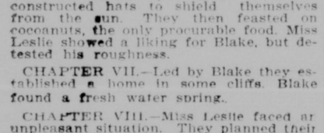
CHAPTER XX.—Winthrope, badly hurt, died the following morning.

CHAPTER XXI.—The storm tore down their distress flag, so a new one was swung from the bamboo pole.

CHAPTER XXII.—Miss Leslie helped in covering Winthrope's grave with stones.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The End of the World.



In the morning he met Miss Leslie with a sullen bearing, which, however, did not altogether conceal his desire to be on friendly terms. Having regained her self-control, she responded to this with such tact that by evening each felt more at ease in the new relationship, and Blake had lost every trace of his moroseness. The fact that both were passionately fond of music proved an immense help. It gave them an impersonal source of mutual sympathy and understanding—a common meeting-ground in the world of art and culture, apart from and above the plane of their material wants.

Yet for all his enjoyment of the girl's wide knowledge of everything relating to music, Blake took care that their talks and discussions did not interfere with the activities of their primitive mode of life. As soon as he had finished with the barricade he devoted himself to his tailoring and shoe-making; while Miss Leslie, between her cooking and wood-gathering and daily visits to the cliff for eggs, had much to occupy both her thoughts and her hands.

At first every ascent of the cliff was embittered by a painful consciousness of the cairn over the north edge. Fortunately it was not in sight from the direct path to the headland, and, as she refrained from visiting it, the new happenings of her wild life soon thrust Winthrope and his death out of the foreground of her thoughts. Each day she had to nerve herself to meet the beaks and wings of the despoiled nest-owners; each day she looked with greater hope for the expected rescue ship, only to be increasingly disappointed.

But the hours she spent on the cliff crest after gathering the day's supply of eggs were not spent merely in watching and longing. The inconveniences of carrying the eggs in a handkerchief or in one of the heavy jars suggested a renewal of her attempt at basket-making. Memory, perseverance and a trace of inventiveness enabled her to produce a small but serviceable hamper of split bamboo.

Encouraged by this success she gathered a quantity of tough, wiry grass, and wove a hat to take the place of the flimsy palm-leaf make-shift. The result was by no means satisfactory with regard to style, its shape being intermediate between a Mexican sombrero and a funnel; but aside from its appearance, she could not have wished for a more comfortable head-cover. Before showing it to Blake, she wove a second one for him, so that they were able to cast aside the grotesque, palm-leaf affairs at the same time.

The following morning Blake appeared in an outfit to match her leopard-skin dress. He had singed off the hair of the hide out of which he had made his moccasins, and his hyena-skin trousers quite matched the bristling stubble on his face.

"Hey, Miss Jenny!" he hailed; "what d' you think of this for fancy needlework?"

"Splendid! You're the very picture of an Argentine vaquero."

"Greaser?—ugh! Let me get back to the Weary Willy pants!"

"I mean you are very picturesque."

"That's it, is it? Glad I've got something to call your leopardine gown that won't make you huffy."

"We can at least call our costumes serviceable, and mine has proved much cooler than I expected."

"But our new hats beat all for that—regular sunshades. What do you say?—there's a good breeze— Let's take a hike."

"Not to the river! The very thought of that dreadful snake—"

"No; just the other way. I've been thinking for some time that we ought to run down to that south headland and take a squint at the coast beyond. Ten to one it's another stretch of swamps, but—"

"You think there is a chance we may find a town?"

"About one chance in a million, even for a native village. The slave trade wiped the niggers off this coast, and I guess those that hit out up-country ran so hard they haven't been able to get back yet."

"But it has been years since the slave trade was forbidden."

"And they don't sell beer in Kansas—oh, no! I'll bet the dhows still slip over from Madagascar when the moon is in the right quarter. At any rate, niggers are mighty scarce or mighty shy around here. I've kept a watch for smoke, and haven't seen a suspicion of it anywhere. Maybe the swamps swing around inland and cut off this strip of coast. It looked that way to me when I made that trip along the ridge. But there's a chance it used to be inhabited, and we may run across an abandoned village."

"I do not see that the discovery would do us any good."

"How about the chance of grain or bananas still growing? But that's all a guess. We're going because we need a change."

She nodded and hastened to prepare breakfast, while he packed a skin bag with food and examined the slender tips of his arrows. As a matter of precaution, he had been keeping them in the cigarette case, where the points would be certain of a coat of the sticky poison and at the same time guarded against inflicting a chance wound. But as he was now about to set out on a journey he fitted tips into the heads of his two straightest shafts.

The morning was still fresh when they closed the barricade behind them and descended to the pool. There was no game in sight, but Blake had no wish to hunt at the commencement of the trip. The steady southwest wind had blown the sky clear of its malarial haze and gave promise of a day which should know nothing of sultry calm—a day on which game would be hard to stalk, but one perfectly suited for a long tramp.

Mindful of ticks, Blake headed obliquely across to the beach. Once on the smooth, hard sand, they swung along at a brisk pace, light-hearted and keen with the spirit of adventure. Never had they felt more companionable. Miss Leslie laughed and chatted and sang snatches of songs, while Blake beat time with his club, or sought to whistle grand opera—he had healed his blistered lips some time before by liberal applications of antelope tallow.

Gulls and terns circled about them or hovered over the water ready to swoop down upon their finny prey. Sandpipers ran along the beach within a stone's throw, but the curlews showed their greater knowledge of mankind by keeping beyond gunshot.

Once a great flock of geese drove high overhead, their leader honking the alarm as they swept above the suspicious figures on the beach. Like the curlews, they had knowledge of mankind. But the flock of white pelicans which came sailing along in stately leisure on their immense wings floated past so low that Blake felt certain he could shoot one. He raised his bow and took aim, but refrained from shooting at the thought that it might be a sheer waste of his precious poison.

A little later a herd of large animals appeared on the border of the grass jungle, but wheeled and dashed back into cover so quickly that Blake barely had time to make out that they were buffaloes—the first he had seen on this coast, but easily recognized by their resemblance to the Cape variety. Their flight gave him small concern; for the time being he was more interested in topography than game.

The southern headland now lay close before them, its seaward face rearing up sheer and lofty, but the approach behind running down in broken terraces. Mid-morning found the explorers at the foot of the ridge. Blake squinted up at the bowlder-strewn slopes and the crannies of the broken ledges.

"Likely place for snakes, Miss Jenny," he remarked. "Guess I'd better lead."

Eager as she was to look over into the country beyond, the girl dropped into second place and made no complaint about the wary slowness of her companion's advance. She found the most difficult parts of the ascent quite easy after her training on the tree-ladder. Blake could have taken ledges and all at a run, but as he mounted each terrace he halted to spy out the ground before him. Like Miss Leslie, he was looking for snakes, though for an exactly opposite reason. He wished to add to the contents of the cigarette case.

Greatly to his disappointment and the girl's relief neither snake nor sign of snake was to be seen all the way up the ridge. As they neared the crest Blake turned to offer her his hand up the last ledges, and in the instant they gained the top.

The wind, now freshening to a gale, struck the girl with such force that she would have been blown back down the ledges had not Blake clutched her wrist. Heedless alike of the painful grip which held her and of the gusts which tore at her skirt, the girl stood gazing out across the desolate swamps which stretched away to the southwest as far as the eye could see. She did not speak until Blake led her down behind the shelter of the crest ledges.

"What's the matter?" he demanded. "Didn't I warn you?"

She looked away to hide the tears which sprang into her eyes.

"I can't explain—only, it makes me feel so—so lonely!"

"Oh, come now, little woman; don't take on so!" he urged. "It might be a lot worse, you know. We've gotten along pretty well, considering."

"You have been very kind, Mr. Blake, and as you say, matters might have been worse. I do not forget how far more terrible was our situation the morning after the storm. Yet you must realize how disappointing it is to lose even the slightest hope of escape."

"Well, I don't know. If it wasn't for the fever that's bound to come with the rain, I, for one, would just as leave stick to this camp right along, providing the company don't change."

She turned upon him with flashing eyes, all thought of caution lost in her anger. "How dare you say such a thing? You are contemptible! I despise you!"

"My, Miss Jenny, but you are pretty when you get mad!" he exclaimed.

The answer took her completely aback. He was neither angry nor laughing at her, but met her defiant glance with candid, sober admiration. There was something more than admiration in his glowing eyes; yet she could not but see that her alarm had been baseless. His manner had never been more respectful. Suddenly she found that she could no longer meet his gaze. She looked away and stammered lamely: "You—you shouldn't say such things, you know."

"Why not? Hasn't everything been running smooth the last few days? Haven't we been good chummy comrades? Of course you've got the worst of the deal. I know I'm not much on fancy talk; but I like to hear it when I've a chance. I've led a lonesome sort of life since they did for my sisters— No, I'm not going to rake that up again. I'm only trying to give you an idea what it means to a fellow to be with a lady like you. Maybe it isn't polite to tell you all this, but it's just what I feel, and I never did amount to shucks as a liar."

"I believe I understand you, Mr. Blake, and I really feel highly complimented."

"No, you don't, any such thing, Miss Jenny. Own up, now! If I met you to-morrow on your papa's doorstep, you'd cut me cold."

"I should if you continued to be so rude. Have you no regard for my feelings? But here we are, talking nonsense when we should be going—"

"Is it nonsense?" he broke in. "What does life mean, anyway? Here we can be true friends and comrades—real, free living people. It can't be that you want to go back to all those society shams after you've seen real life! As for me, what have I to gain by going back to the everlasting grind? I don't mind work; but when a man has nothing ahead to work for but a bank account, when it's grind, grind, grind till your head goes stale and all the world looks black, then there's no choice but throw up your job and go on a drunk, if you want to keep from a gun accident. Maybe you don't understand it. But that's what I've had to go through, time and again. Do you wonder I like to fancy an everlasting picnic here, with a little partner who wouldn't let me come within shouting distance of her in the land of lavender—trousers and peek-a-boos?"

"Mr. Blake, really you are most unjust! I could not be so—so ungrateful, after all your kindness. I—we should certainly be glad to number you among our friends."

"Drink and all, eh?"

"A man of your will-power has no need whatever to give way to such a habit."

"Course not, if he's got anything in sight worth while. Guess, though, my folks must have been poor white trash. I never could go after money just for the fun of the game. No family, no friends, no—what-you-call-it?—culture— What's the use? I have a fair head for figures; but all the mathematics that I know I've had to catch hot off the bat. It's true I grubbed my C. E. out of a correspondence school; but a fellow has to have an all-round, crack-up education to put him where it's worth while."

"You still have time to work up. You are not much over 30."

"Twenty-seven."

"Twenty-seven! I should have thought— What a hard life you must have had!"

"Hard work? Well, I suppose Panama did do for me some. But it wasn't so much that. Few fellows could hit up the pace I've set and come out at all."

"I do not understand."

"Just what you might expect of a fellow in my fix—all kinds of gamble and drink and—the rest of it."

Miss Leslie looked away, visibly distressed. She had not been reared after the French method. Young as she was, she had fluttered at will about the borders of the garden of vice, knowing well that the gaudy blossoms were lures to entice one into the pitfall. Yet never before had she caught so clear a glimpse of the slimy depths.

"That's it!" growled Blake. "Throw me down cold just because I'm square enough to tell you straight out. You make me tired! I'm not one of the work-ox sort, that can chew the cud all the year round and cork the blood out of their brains. I've got to cut loose from the infernal grind once in a while, and barring a chance now and then at opera, there's never been anything but a spree—"

"Oh, but that's so dreadfully shocking, Mr. Blake!"

"And then like all the other little hypocrites, you'll go and marry one of those swell dudes who's made that sort of thing his business, and everybody knows it, but it's all politely understood to've been sub rosa, so it's all right, because he knows how to part his name in the middle and—"

"Please, please stop, Mr. Blake! You don't know how cruel you are!"

"Cruel? Suppose I told you about the millionaire cur that— Oh, now, don't go and cry! Please don't cry, Miss Jenny! I wouldn't hurt your feelings for the world! I didn't mean anything out of the way, really I didn't! It's only that when I get to thinking of—of things, it sets me half crazy. And now, can't you see how it's going to be ten times worse for me after—with you so altogether beyond me—" He stopped short,

"What Does Life Mean, Anyway?"

flushed, and stammered lamely: "I—I didn't mean to say that!"

She looked down, no less embarrassed.

"Please let us talk of something else," she murmured. "It has been such a pleasant morning, until you—until we began this silly discussion."

"All right, all right! Only mop up the dewdrops and we'll turn on the sun machine. I really didn't mean to rip out that way at all. But, you see, the thing's been rankling in me ever since we came aboard ship at the Cape, and Winthrope and Lady Bayrose had my seat changed so I couldn't see you— Not that I hold anything against them now—"

"Mr. Blake, I suppose you know that this African coast is particularly dangerous for women. So far I have escaped the fever. But you yourself said that the longer the attack is delayed the worse it will be."

Blake's face darkened and he turned to stare inland along the ridge. She had flicked him on the raw, and he thought that she had done so intentionally.

"You think I haven't tried—that I've been shamming!" he burst out bitterly. "You're right. There's the one chance— But I couldn't leave you till the barricade was finished, and it's been only a few days since— All the same, I oughtn't to 've waited a day. I'll start it to-morrow."

"What? Start what?"

"A catamaran. I can rig one up in short order that, with a skin sail and an outrigger, will do fairly well to coast along inside the reefs—barring squalls. Worst thing is that it's all a guess whether the nearest settlement is up the coast or down."

"And you can think of going and leaving me all alone here!"

"That's better than letting you risk two-to-one chances on feeding the sharks."

"But you'd be risking it!"

Blake uttered a short harsh laugh.

"What's the difference?" he paused a moment; then added, with grim humor: "Anyway, they'll have earned a meal by the time they get me chewed up."

"You sha'n't go!"

"Oh, I don't know. We'll see about it to-morrow. There's a grove of cocoanuts yonder. Come on, and I'll get some nuts. I can't see any water around here, and it would be dry eating, with only the flask."

CHAPTER XXIV.

A Lion Leads Them.

The palm grove stood under the lee of the ridge on a stretch of bare ground. Other than seaward, the open space was hemmed in by grass jungle, interspersed with clumps of thorn-brush. On the north side a jutting corner of the tall, yellow spear-grass curved out and around, with the point of the hook some 50 yards from the palms. Elsewhere the distance to the jungle was nearly twice as far.

Blake dropped the bag and his weapons, flung down his hat and started up a palm shaft. The down-pointing bristles of his skin trousers aided his grip. Though the lofty crown of the palm was swaying in the wind he reached the top and was down again before Miss Leslie had arranged the contents of the lunch bag.

"Guess you're not extra hungry," he remarked.

She made no response.

"Mad, eh? Well, toss me the little knife. Mine has got too good a meat-edge to spoil on these husks."

"It was very kind of you to climb for the nuts, and the wind blowing so hard up there," she said, as she handed over the penknife. "I am not angry. It is only that I feel tired and depressed. I hope I am not going to be—"

"No; you're not going to have the fever, or any such thing! You're played out, that's all. I'm a fool for bringing you so far. You'll be all right after you eat and rest. Here; drink this cocoa milk."

She drained the nut, and, upon his insistence, made a pretense at eating. He was deceived until, with the satisfying of his first keen hunger, he again became observant.

"Say, that won't do!" he exclaimed. "Look at your bowl. You haven't nibbled enough to keep a mouse alive."

"Really, I am not hungry. But I am resting."

"Try another nut. I'll have one ready in two shakes."

He caught his hat, which was dragging past in a downward eddy of the wind, and weighted it with a cocoanut. He wedged another nut between his knees and bent over it, tearing at the husk. It took him only a few moments to strip the fiber from the end and gouge open the germ hole. He held out the nut and glanced up to meet her smile of acceptance.

She was staring past him, her eyes wide with terror, and the color fast receding from her face.

"What in— Another snake?" he demanded, twisting warily about to glare at the ground behind him.

"There—over in the grass!" she whispered. "It looked out at me with terrible, savage eyes!"

"Snake?—that far off?"

"No, no!—a monster—a huge, fierce beast!"

"Beast?" echoed Blake, grasping his bow and arrows. "Where is he? Maybe only one of these African buffaloes. How'd he look?—horns?"

"I—I didn't see any. It was all shaggy, and yellow like the grass, and terrible eyes—Oh!"

The girl's scream was met by a ferocious, snarling roar, so deep and prolonged that the air quivered and the very ground seemed to shake.

"God!—a lion!" cried Blake, the hair on his bare head bristling like a startled animal's.

He turned squarely about toward the ridge, his bow half drawn. Had the lion shown himself then Blake would have shot on the instant. As it was, the beast remained behind the screening border of grass, where he could watch his intended quarry without being seen in turn. The delay gave Blake time for reflection. He spoke sharply, as it were biting off his words: "Hit out. I'll stop the bluffer."

"I can't. Oh, I'm afraid!"

Again the hidden beast gave voice to his mighty rumbling challenge. Still he did not appear, and Blake attempted a derisive jeer: "Hey, there, louder! We've not run yet! It's all right, little woman. The skulking sneak is trying to bluff us. 'Fraid to come out if we don't stampede. He'll make off when he finds we don't scare. Lions never tackle men in the daytime. Just keep cool a while. He'll—"

"Look!—there to the right!—I saw him again! He's creeping around! See the grass move!"

"That's only the wind. It eddies down—God! he is stalking around. Trying to take us from behind—curse him! He may get me, but I'll get him, too—the dirty sneak!"

Gold Sweats.

Gold in transit by sea "sweats," however tightly it may be packed. It is usually sent in stout kegs, and squeezed in as tightly as possible; but there is a regular allowance for loss by attrition upon the voyage, and in the course of years this loss to the commercial world amounts to a large sum.

According to the market records the consumption of eggs in New York city annually is 632 for each inhabitant.

TOBACCO'S ILL EFFECTS.

Member of Salvation Army Tells Why He Gave It Up.

I first used tobacco when I was 1 years old, and thought I was doing something great because I was imitating men. It was only a short time till I smoked and chewed all the time. I wanted to quit the habit, but it had me bound hand and foot, body and soul, mind and heart. Tobacco made a liar of me, a thief of me, a swearer of me and a drunkard of me; a man that could not be depended upon. Some people may say, who read this piece: "It has not done so for me." But it has for thousands. As a Salvationist, writes William Penn, a member of the staff of the Salvation Army at Buffalo, I have dealt with many about the habit, and the majority of them admit what I say to be true.

First, liar. Most users of tobacco know men that never buy tobacco, always bumming it. They ask the man that buys his tobacco for a chew; he will nearly always say: "I have the last chew in my mouth," when he has a plug in his pocket, so is telling a lie.

Second, thief. When I had no money to buy tobacco I would not hesitate to steal it; in fact, I did so many a time. So will almost any user of tobacco. The craving for it is simply fierce, and you will not hesitate to steal to satisfy the craving.

Third, swearer. When I would strike my last match and wind would blow it out I would swear and blaspheme. Many a smoker who reads this knows what that means.

Fourth, drunkard. Tobacco creates a thirst that in the majority of cases takes strong drink to quench.

Fifth, a man that cannot be depended upon. It racks our nerves, it makes you quick tempered, fly off the handle at the least thing; it makes you so that you cannot think clearly; it lessens your self-respect; it affects the heart to such an extent that doctors told me I had to quit or be paralyzed or possibly drop dead.

Then, think of my spiritual condition. A sinner, facing paralysis or sudden death, with a habit that I was powerless to stop; unable to help myself, not knowing of Christ's power to save, hopeless concerning my prospects after death.

One night, after being on a spree, I heard the army drum. God bless the drum! I followed to the hall, heard the soldiers and officers tell of Jes love and power to save from sin a bad habits, and a few nights afte asked God, for Jesus' sake, to save me. I told him in my own way I wanted to be a Christian and to be free from tobacco. His blood availed for me. I went home, took pipes and tobacco and threw them into the stove. I have been free since, delivered by the Lord God of hosts. It is going on three years now since I have been saved. I have had my ups and downs, but I believe that the effects of tobacco on my nerves and heart have about worn off.

Comrades, be charitable toward the ex-smoker and chewer, as the habit leaves him in bad shape.

I now have a good experience, which is getting better every day. God bless our great Salvation Army! Let us all fight the tobacco evil!

IT DOESN'T PAY.

Why John Concluded He Would Vote the Dry Ticket.

The following conversation is reported by the American Issue as having taken place recently in a saloon located in one of the counties of Ohio.

The saloon keeper and John were discussing the issue, until finally John, who was an Irishman, said:

"Yes, Bennie, I'm going to vote dry next fall."

Ben—Now, John, I think you are joking. You are too good a friend of mine to want me put out of business. Just think—I have been here 20 years, and all the money I have made I have put into this business; how am I going to get my money out?

John—Well, Ben, I have been here 20 years, and all the money I have made I have put into this business; how am I going to get my money out of it?

An Archbishop's Ban on Liquor.

Archbishop Glennon at the Triennial synod in Kenrick seminary, recently enjoined the 400 priests of the diocese of St. Louis not to permit in future the serving of wine or beer at church picnics, fairs, or entertainments of any kind nor at the banquets of church societies. The council of Baltimore several years ago adopted a rule against intoxicants at such parish events, but this has never been enforced in St. Louis. The archbishop stated that hereafter the rule would be rigidly applied.

Prime Minister a Total Abstainer.

M. Clemenceau, the premier of France, and one of the most prominent political figures in Europe, is reported to be a total abstainer. Brandes, his intimate friend, says that Clemenceau has the Parisian habit of rising every morning, winter and summer, at five o'clock, and by ten o'clock he has most of his work for the day accomplished. He drinks neither wine nor beer nor any other alcoholic beverage.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

At the Hunting Ground

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

KERMIT ROOSEVELT.

"SEVEN hundred and fifty thousand square miles of the greatest hunting ground on earth"—such is probably Mr. Roosevelt's description of British East Africa, and, typical of his venturesome character, he has chosen the wildest and most inaccessible portion of this area of forest and veldt, desert and swamp, jungle and tableland, mountain and rift, as the center of his hunting operations.

At the railway stations at Voi, Makindu, Kiu, Athi River, Londiani and Escarpment accommodations are to be had for hunters who desire to leave the train and shoot antelopes, bucks, rhinos, elephants or any other game that may be taken. Ice is made artificially for travelers at these stations, and at times the train passes through fields of corn and millet and plantations of oranges and sweet potatoes.

At Port Florence the party embarks on the comfortable twin screw lake steamer Winifred, having baths, electric lights, etc., for an eighteen hour run across the lake to Entebbe, whence the Roosevelt hunting expedition in its entirety will start into the unknown for many months, lost almost as completely to the outside world as though its members were hunting hippopotamuses in the canals of Mars.

From six to seven months will be consumed by the party in the fastnesses of Uganda, for many years the kingdom of wars, murders, slave selling and wife killing, where even today cannibalism is not wholly wiped out, where the dwarf Negritos shoot poisoned arrows at white men and where the tsetse fly has caused the death of as many as 40,000 men, women and children in one year.

Entebbe, capital and "port of entry" of the kingdom of Uganda, reached by steaming across crocodile infested Lake Victoria Nyanza, on which one can sail over 200 miles without sighting land from the masthead, provides every facility for invaders of the surrounding unknown. Here it was that the Italian Duke of the Abruzzi prepared for his notable trip in 1906 to the snow capped though equatorial Ruwenzori range, anciently known as the mysterious Mountains of the Moon, lying west of the particular territory chosen by Mr. Roosevelt as his field, but close enough to afford him a good view of what Aristotle termed the Mountain of Silver.

Weeks before the hunters of big game, like the Roosevelt party, reach Entebbe preparations are made by commissioned persons. Native porters and guides—Bagandas, Swahilis and Somalis—are engaged as well as "boys" to aid in the work about the camps, and a large bulk of supplies is made ready, saving delay. Most carriers are Bagandas, the native population of Uganda, who have preserved a verbal record of the history of their nation reaching down through thirty-six kings from the fourteenth century. Swahilis are half Arab and half Bantu, the latter a widely scattered negro race of small stature. Somalis are generally incompetent and deceitful.

On the arrival of the hunters and explorers at Entebbe the final organization of the caravan, or "safari," as such expeditions are termed, is completed. Each man is drilled in the particular work he is to do afield, luggage is separated into packs of from fifty to sixty pounds to be carried on porters' heads, a critical overhauling is given guns, ammunition and medicine chest, and last letters are mailed to the "outside." Early morning, just after sunup, the word to start is given. The porters, a hundred or more of them, gruntingly balance their packs on their heads, worn smooth by such work, and amid deafening shouts start strung out in single file on the road leading to the trail toward Lake Isolt, followed by a dusky file of askaris, or native police, armed with Snider rifles for protection of the camp at night; next the tent boys and personal servants of the leaders of the party, the cooks and cooks' helpers. Now comes the nesara, or headman, the active and intelligent native generalissimo of all the forces, who can make the expedition a success or a failure; next the syces, who take care of the ponies, if such are taken, and lastly the hunters themselves, with their gun bearers, usually Somalis of "selected stock."

Out of sight in the distance are the foremost members of the safari of from probably 300 to 400 men, when the hunters themselves tighten their puttee straps, adjust their pith helmets and, undaunted, take their places in the march into the majestic vaults of the tropical forest where many an unfortunate man has gone never to return.

The British protectorate of Uganda, still a native kingdom under youthful Kobaka Dandi Chwa, son of atrocious Mwanga, seller of women, covers 80,000 square miles, with subterritories. Mr. Roosevelt's plans include traversing the very heart of it, continuing northward to Gondokoro, across the headwaters of the Nile, outpost of British Sudan, where Mrs. Roosevelt hopes to join him in a journey down the Nile.

The country first invaded and where the hunting is done is a virgin haunt of big game, the like of which exists nowhere else in the known world. It is a varied fastness, almost completely surrounded by Lake Victoria Nyanza, to the southeast; Lake Albert Edward, southwest, near Ruwenzori; Lake Albert, northwest, and the headwaters of the Nile and the ramifying Lake Choga to the northwest, north and northeast.

Although limited by his license to the killing of two male elephants, two rhinoceroses, ten hippopotamuses and twenty-one antelopes, including two kudos, two gembok and one bongo, species of antelope; two earth hogs, two earth wolves, ten chevrotains, two colobi or other fur coated monkeys, two marabou storks, two aigrets, two ostriches and one chimpanzee, Mr. Roosevelt can shoot all he desires of the following: Lions, lionesses, male Cape buffaloes, leopards, crocodiles, wart hogs and reptiles and any birds, except vultures, owls, whale billed storks, crowned cranes or young or female ostriches. Forbidden to shoot zebras, giraffes or elands, female or young elephants or Johnston's okapi, he hopes to bring back a live specimen of the latter rare animal, as none has ever been seen outside of the African wilds.

On, on into the heart of the unknown presses the safari, rising the while on the Uganda plateau, where the air is cooler and where the usual midday rest, when the sun is hottest, can be somewhat shortened if necessary. Working on out of the first strip of forest beyond Entebbe is entered a region of rolling hills, the earth brick red, the high ground growing deep grass, "elephant grass," from ten to twenty feet high, with here and there single trees or groups set in brushwood and thorn. The valley bottoms produce luxuriant forests, and where the waters are stagnant immense swamps spread away, covered with papyrus and aquatic plants. Elephants feed on the elephant grass, lions hide in it and lurk in it, and hippos and rhinos escape into it from their favorite watery wallowing places. The principal trees on the hills and in the forest are the acacia, mimosa, euphorbia, erithryna and spathodea.

Like oases in masses of tangled growth are the forest zones in the valleys along the brooks, where the palms and other trees rise 100 feet high, embraced by the long, ropy vines of giant lianas; the perfumes of jasmine, honeysuckle and mimosa sweeten the air, and beneath is the thick, damp, cool moss, softer than the flower strewn paths of Arcadia. Grateful beyond words to the conqueror of the poison aired jungle, to the fainting plodder over sun baked sand, dead grass and tooth sharp rock or to the piercer of cactus and thorn brush thickets are the gentle forest zones in the valleys.

Approaching the mountainous sections spacious regions are found where strange granite formation is a feature. Rounded granite hummocks, called "moutonnes," push through the soil amid reddish yellow grass mingled with low ferns, and beans can be gathered in large quantities. Moutonnes are evidences of a prehistoric glacial period along the equator.

When traveling at their best speed the natives of the safari cover from ten to eighteen miles on a continuous stretch of from three to four hours; then a rest is taken. Intensely violent tropical thunderstorms frequently interrupt proceedings, and in the regular rainy season malarial fever persistently attacks the whites. The terrific heat at midday is tempered at times by clouds which veil the sun, and the changes of temperature and weather are strikingly sudden. A blazing sun and a bright sky will in a very few minutes be obscured, and darkness swoops down as black as anybody's midnight. Torrents of rain fall, threatening electrical discharges occur, smashing down trees and destroying native huts, and the blazing sun will as quickly reappear. Many a capture of tempting game is prevented by these cyclonic outbursts.

Making camp in the hunting field is a diverting process, the natives erecting their huts with remarkable swiftness. Laughing and singing, they stick flexible canes into the ground in a circle, bending the tops to meet in the middle of the circle, interweaving the ends in the form of a bell or dome. Bundles of elephant grass are then packed on the frame, a small space left open as an entrance. In fifteen minutes a grassy plain is transformed into a prosperous looking native village. Should some village be near, women and swarms of naked children visit to sell food and fruits, and the native chieftain and his council put on clothes and uncomfortably call on the hunters to pay their respects, in exchange to receive something more tangible, like silver trinkets or a pistol or two. Graft is not unknown even in the jungle. It is unknown only where human beings are unknown.

After the evening meal of elephant steak, reedbuck, gazelle or francolins (African partridges) and sweet potatoes or deliciously cool papaw, or egg fruit, plantains or sugar cane the hunters may partake, if they wish, of the native beverages, banana wine or mbisi or mwenge (the latter very strong). Then, lighting their pipes, they discuss plans for the next day's shooting. The neapara theadman sees that the guards are stationed correctly, and soon the jungle trackers are asleep.

No late rising human sloth can hunt big game where shines the Southern Cross. The trailer of the lion and the ponderous pachyderm must up and away from his couch before daybreak, eating his breakfast by candlelight in the quasi darkness of the early morning. By the time the sun's rays concentrate on the jungle he must be off from camp with his helpers to sight his quarry when it first starts on its day's marauding. Lions and elephants are his chief desire, and the latter usually travel in herds, crushing vegetation as they go, tearing up trees by the roots and making havoc generally. The lion is often found in wood scrub and in reed beds along the river ways and in beds of heavy green flag fringing the streams, these flag beds called "tinga-tinga" by the natives. Again, a lion or lioness and cubs will be found taking a siesta on some sunny ledge or crouching, alarmed, in a mountainous cave or under leaning bowlders. Hippos or rhinos also take kindly to sunny spots when the glare is not too great.

In tracking the large game beasts the Uganda huntsman continually comes across countless animals of scores of species. There are over fifty kinds of antelopes alone in Africa, and giraffes, zebras, elands, hartbeests, sing-sing water bucks and other water bucks, impala and kongoni ever and again come into and flee from the range of vision. Multitudes of game fowl and flashily colored "birds of the air" are on every side. The "wuff-wuff" of Grant's gazelles salutes him from the rock kopjes and the grass tufted mead, and above him in narrowing circles hover the vultures—eared vultures, black and discontent; carrion vultures and the small neophrons, dark brown, with repulsive livid pink faces, boon partners all of the hyena and the jackal.

Of course the safari does not escape the deadly menace of the implacable tsetse fly, the desolation spreading scourge of whites and blacks, implanting with its bite the mysterious germ of the incurable sleeping sickness. Mr. Roosevelt has wisely studied every means of protection against this insect. Whole villages have gone to sleep never to awake. Whole tribes have disappeared from the face of the earth because of it. Particularly deadly when attacking males in the prime of life, entire villages are found today where only women and children survive. Stricken natives are driven out of their homes to die in the forest and be torn to pieces by wild beasts.

AWAITING THE CRITICAL MOMENT.

AN EAST AFRICAN WARRIOR.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1909.

BLOWING BREATH INTO A DEFLATED AMENDMENT.

The disfranchising amendment must be in an exceedingly bad way when it is found necessary to try to put life into it by calling on Governor Crothers to step up and clear himself of suspicion of being lukewarm in support of it. The Governor complies in a rattling three-column interview showing how, with the negro disfranchised, his party would have to be on its good behavior all the time.

There is some force in the Governer's answer to the contention that disfranchising the negro will make Maryland overwhelmingly Democratic and put it in the ranks of the one-party States. He says it is already a one-party State. If we admit the truth of this statement, it cannot be said there is so large a Democratic majority that the independent vote cannot always appear formidable in State elections. Then, of course, in city and national elections the negro issue cuts little, if any, figure. Thus, even if we agree that the State would be more independent with the negro vote eliminated, this would certainly not be true of the city, the government of which touches Baltimore in twenty places where the State government touches it once.

The Governor mentions many things his party has done for the State—good-roads laws, oyster laws, corrupt practices act, barratry act—and points to a dozen or more other reforms it will carry through if continued in power. What we cannot understand is why the Democratic party finds it necessary to disfranchise the negro in order to pass any proposed reforms.

The composition of the last Legislature was: Senate—Democrats, 17; Republican, 9; Independent, 1. House of Delegates—Democrats, 71; Republicans, 30. What reason is there to suppose that, if we give the Democratic party a still larger representation in the Legislature, it will pass better laws? It has all the votes it needs now to do anything it wishes to do. If it does not carry out all the reforms that it wishes to carry out, it is because the will, not the power, is lacking.

It is true there are a number of Independent Democrats who believe that disfranchisement of the negro will induce the white vote to divide more readily. We have our doubts on this point so strongly that we do not feel inclined to take the risk of jumping from the frying pan into a possible fire. And last, with all due deference to the Governor, we find it difficult to believe that the argument that seems to have so much weight with him—namely, that eliminating the negro will make it easier for the Republicans to carry Maryland—is the motive that is animating the organization's efforts to pass the amendment.

WIFE DESERTERS.

When the wolf comes to the door—that is the time to try men's souls. Also, it seems, it is the time to try their manhood and their sense of responsibility to those dependents for whose physical and moral well-being they virtually pledged themselves when the state gave them the privilege of mating in marriage. With the ceremony over the duty of the state and of society really ceases. Thenceforward it is "up to" the man to show that he is the proper caliber to take on the duties and obligations of family life. It is pleasant to reflect on the large percentage of men who measure up adequately to the task imposed, theoretically, at least by the state. It is disheartening, on the other hand, to learn that many are willing to flee away from and disavowed these obligations at the first signs of trouble and misfortune—the very time when the wife and mother is in greatest need of a protecting hand—a hand more masterful and one intended by nature (and the state) to cope with the world's rebuffs.

"Thousands of men," says an Albany dispatch, "are deserting their wives and children in New York because they cannot find work." A melancholy state of affairs, to be sure! Did not these men remember the vow to "cherish and protect!" Did they make sacrifice that their wives and children might escape starvation? Doubtless a number of them fled with little or no thought of those for whose protection they pledged themselves at the marriage altar.

He is a miserable coward who deserts his wife and his children at any time. How much more of a craven is the wretch who sneaks away in time of adversity, leaving the struggle of life for mother and children to the weak hands of a woman?.

LOOK OUT FOR THE CARS.

In every country town there is a sign at the railroad crossing like this: "Look out for the cars." Now everybody knew that it was a railroad crossing the day the line was laid and finished. When the sign was put up it took two days for every inhabitant to become familiar with it. In a week every small child could read it backward. Did the railroad take it down? No, if they had the warning would have been forgotten in a week and smash-ups and damage suits would have resulted. One time advertisements act the same way. You must keep everlastingly at it, like the railroad crossing sign.

"What is a home without a paper?" A home without a newspaper is no home at all. It is a kind of dreary den—a rendezvous of bedbugs and fleas, where the inhabitants live in blissful ignorance of what the world is doing. It is inhabited by a class who do not know who is president or what he is president of—who never find out that a thing has happened until every one else has forgotten it. The children grow up in rags and dirt, while the wife generally finds consolation in darning socks and lugging a pipe loaded with long, green tobacco, and the man generally lives because he can't die and he is too lazy to kill himself. He goes out on election days, and does not know who he is voting for, but just takes the ticket bearing the name his great-great-grandfather voted for.—Riceville (Minn.) Leader.

Free Distribution of Nut Trees.

The Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station has free for distribution this spring to people especially interested in nut culture a number of pecan trees and probably will have Persian walnut trees also. In order to create an interest in nut growing among the school children these trees will be sent free to schools for Arbor Day planting. All schools and interested parties who will agree to plant, care for and report on the condition of the trees may receive them by applying at once to C. P. Close, Horticulturist, College Park, Md. The trees will be distributed the last of March or early in April. Requests will be filled as long as the supply lasts.

Strikers Stir Up Excitement.

Tunnelton, W. Va., was thrown into a wild state of excitement Sunday afternoon. John S. Douglas and Claude Mankins, two of the leading strikers, practically held up the town and assaulted George Laughry and George Zetty, two of the company's workmen. Zetty was assailed in a restaurant. In defending himself, Zetty floored Douglas with a malt bottle. Douglas and Mankins were arrested and placed in the lock-up, but were released by the mayor and left for parts unknown. Both of these strikers were among those recently enjoined. The hearing on the injunctions that was to be held on the sixth of this month before U. S. Judge A. G. Dayton, has been postponed until the first of April. U. S. Deputy Marshall E. D. Hupp arrived at Tunnelton to take charge of the strike situation again and will remain for an indefinite period.

The Appalachian Park.

"The Sixtieth Congress did a few good things," says the Baltimore Sun, "among which," the Sun continues, "may be included the passage of the bill creating national parks in Maine, New Hampshire, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky. The land will be acquired at a cost not to exceed $19,000,000. One million dollars is to be available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and $2,000,000 a year in subsequent fiscal years out of the proceeds of the sale of timber from the forest reserves of the West. No money is to be taken directly from the Treasury, but of the funds available from the forest reserves $19,000,000 may be used in the next ten years. The public interest in the protection of the mountain forests is very great. This protection not only lessens the expenditure for dredging navigable streams and the bars at their mouths, but conserve waterpowers. The Appalachian Park of 3,000,000 acres produce now some 250,000 horsepower, but 2,500,000 horse power is available, a large part of which would be lost if deforestation were allowed to proceed unchecked. The new law is accordingly one which commands general approval.

CIRCUIT COURT WAS IN SESSION BUT TWO DAYS

And Then Took a Recess Until Monday Morning, March 29th.

The regular March non-jury term of the Circuit Court for Garrett county convened Monday morning, the 15th inst., with Chief Justice A. Hunter Boyd presiding, and at noon on Tuesday took a recess until Monday, March 29th, when the session will be reconvened and the cases appearing on the several dockets will be taken up and disposed of Associate Judge Robert R. Henderson was expected to convene court Monday but he has not fully recovered from a recent attack of illness, hence it was deemed unwise by Judge Henderson's physicians for their patient to expose himself to the rigors of the weather usually prevailing in Garrett county at this season of the year. Judge Henderson is deservedly popular in Garrett county, the people appreciating to a marked degree the judicial ability displayed at all times and under all circumstances by him and trust that he may speedily be restored to his accustomed robust health.

While Judge Henderson is popular both on and off the bench, Chief Judge Boyd is also deservedly popular with Garrett countians.

Very few cases were disposed of during the two days' session of court, the witnesses summoned being absent or the principals having the hearings postponed until a later session of court.

A number of judgments were entered in uncontested cases.

The appeal case of Mrs. Mary Pysell vs. John Miller, appealed from Justice Hoye's decision, involving the sum of $6, was gone into but not completed at the hour of adjournment. It will be resumed on the 29th inst.

The attachment case of Charles F. Dawson vs. P. T. Garthright, appealed from Justice Kerfoot's decision, was concluded by the Court quashing the attachment proceedings, resulting in a verdict for Dawson.

The trespass case of John T. Mitchell vs. Eli Stanton et al. will be submitted to the Court upon an agreed statement of facts and argued by the attorneys before Judge Boyd in Cumberland on Saturday.

Free Demonstration of the Tuberculin Test for Maryland Dairy Farmers.

The veterinarian of the Marylard Agricultural College and Experiment Station will give a practical demonstration of the tuberculin test as applied to cattle for the detection of tuberculosis on April 8th and 9th, 1909.

The general plan of the work will consist in examination of cattle under normal conditions, including temperature taking, beginning at 9 a. m., April 8th, and lasting until 7 p. m. of the next day. At this hour the tuberculin injections will be made, and temperatures taken during the ensuing 24 hours or as much thereof as may be necessary.

It will be noticed that the test occupies 34 continuous hours, and lodgings will not have to be arranged for until the completion of the demonstration.

Those who do not desire to return home immediately after the demonstration should secure accommodations in Washington as we are not prepared to furnish lodgings at the College.

Meals, however, will be served at 25 cents each during the continuance of the demonstration.

The demonstration, use of instruments, material, etc., is free of all charge and is intended to familiarize the cattle owners of Maryland with the details of the test and enable them to perform practically the work which a proper tuberculin test involves.

In order that we may provide sufficient material and make proper arrangements, it is necessary that all those intending to avail themselves of the demonstration should notify at once the Veterinary Department, Maryland Experiment Station, College Park, Md.

Conditions Alike In Other Schools.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I was much interested and a little amused by reading the "Patron's" letter some weeks ago in your paper. I was not amused at the evil he pointed out but because he seems to be unaware that it exists elsewhere.

I think I am safe in saying that one-fourth of the schoolhouses in the county do not have even the means of lowering the upper sash of the windows, while I believe not one has other means. I will admit that it is an evil and should be corrected in the Oakland school, but I would like to ask you a question: Wherein are the pupils of the Oakland schools better than the farmers' boys and girls in the county?

If the Oakland pupils must have this protection at any cost do not other pupils require it, too. It seems also that our "Patron's" picture is some what overdrawn and the danger is not so grave. Cutter's Physiology says: "Always have one sash lowered fron the top thus allowing the foul air to pass out."

Hoping our "Patron" will not be offended by these few words allow me to subscribe myself A TEACHER.

SUPPORT OF HOME PAPER.

Merchants Urged to Back Local Advertising Medium to the Limit.

An appreciative view of the home newspaper is given in the Office Outfitter of Chicago from which we make the following extracts:

Many a good town isn't worth a cent because the local newspaper is neglected. Many a good merchandising center is dead because the men in business treat the editor of the newspaper as an object of charity. This is wrong. The local paper is the greatest thing in the community. It should be supported. It should be read and patronized. The merchants who think they are clever and smart when they slip one over on the local paper make a big mistake. Every dollar you take away from the local newspaper in schemes and knocks hurts the town. It hurts business, and most of all, it hurts the merchants who indulge in it.

Whatever else you merchants do patronize your home paaer. Don't tell me that it has a small circulation. Don't tell me that you reach ten times as many people with less expense using circulars. Don't spring any of those time worn gags on me at all. Stop standing in your own light. Get behind the local paper and push it for all you are worth. I don't mean push it to the wall. Push it up grade to a position where it ought to be, and as sure as you are alive you will push your own business up with it to a point you never dreamed of before.

When a man tells me that he reaches more people and gets better results from his circulars I knew that he is deceiving himself and telling me what I can prove to be untrue. A newspaper in the community is read by the people. They learn to watch for it, and when they get it every member of the family wants to see what it says. Ads. and all are read. If the merchants of a community will educate the people to look in the newspaper for their announcements the people will read the paper more and greater will be the returns.

There is no alley so long but that has its ash barrels, and there is no knock so powerful or subtle but that it reacts. Do yourself a favor and keep up your end by supporting the local newspaper, and support it for all you are worth.

It can be added that whatever the local papers do to help their city or town is of benefit to every business man therein.—Chelsea (Mass.) Record.

Resolutions of Respect.

At the last meeting of Garrett Lodge, Knights of Pythias, the following resolutions in memory of the late C. M. Rathbun, a member of that organization, were adopted:

WHEREAS, The Great and Supreme Ruler of this Universe has in His infinite wisdom removed from Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias, of Oakland, Md., one of our most worthy and esteemed Knights, Brother Clarence M. Rathbun; and

WHEREAS, The long and intimate relations held with him in the faithful discharge of his duties in this order makes it eminently fitting that we record our appreciation of him, therefore be it

Resolved, That the wisdom and ability which he has exercised in the aid of our organization by service, contributions and counsel will be held in grateful remembrance.

Resolved, That the sudden removal of such a Brother from our midst leaves a vacancy and a shadow that will be deeply realized by all members and friends of this organization and will prove a serious loss to us.

Resolved, That with deep sympathy with the bereaved relatives of the deceased we express our hope that even so great a loss to us all may be overruled for good by Him who doeth all things well.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this organization, a copy printed in the local papers and a copy sent to the bereaved family.

All of which is respectfully submitted in F., C. and B.,

DEATH RECORD.

LEWIS WEIMER.

Lewis Weimer, aged six years, departed this life Friday night, February 2, at the home of his parents near Cherry Tree Meadow. Death was caused by scarlet fever, with which the little one suffered some time. He was an obedient son, a studious scholar and a gentle playmate. He knew not sin. Standing by his grave we remembered that "dust thou art, to dust returneth" was not spoken of the soul but of the body. The interment took place Sunday morning at Thayerville, Rev. C. W. Hudson, of the Baptist church, conducting the service.

SCRUB PINE AS PULP MATERIAL

The Long Neglected Jersey Scrub Pine Has a Use.

The long-neglected and despised scrub or Jersey pine, growing on the abandoned farms and cut-over lands of the East, seems destined at least to have reached its rightful place as material of value, according to the results obtained through recent pulp and paper making tests at the United States Forest Service laboratories in Washington.

While there is a considerable amount of this wood standing as timber, it has heretofore used only in a very desultory fashion, and then mostly as fuel. About 500,000 acres, or 20 percent of the wooded area of Maryland, about 130,000 acres, or 10 per cent of that of Virginia, is covered with fairly dense stands, while the broad range of the tree extends along the Atlantic seaboard from Southern New York to South Carolina, and back over the Appalachians to central Indiana, where its largest specimens are found.

While a number of mills have used scrub pine for the manufacture of soda pulp and ground wood, no plants have ever operated the sulphite process. Scrub pine might have been used to good advantage long ago, but for the fact that it did not seem to the practical paper maker even worthy of trial. By only slight changes of the regular cooking treatment which is ordinarily accorded pulp wood in the sulphite process, however, it has now yielded a pulp product which has been favorably commented upon by numerous members of the paper trade as a substitute for spruce sulphite in the manufacture of news paper.

When a forest of scrub pine is matured, a fully-stocked stand will yield thirty to forty cords per acre, when economically harvested, according to practical forestry methods. At the present time there is practically no general use for the timber, outside of fuel, although a coarse lumber is made of it and it is sometimes used for fencing. An evidence of the low esteem in which this pine is held is the price the Maryland wood brings when delivered—$5.75 per cord.

SHORT RUN.

Our school "marm" was giving her little pupils instructions on the subject of idiom last week and asked her class to give an example of "the bitter end." Willie Jones said, "The Japanese chased the Russians to the bitter end." "Very good," said the teacher, "Yes, Bobby Brown, you may speak." Red with excitement little Bobby spoke up: "Our dog chased our cat over the fence and bit 'er end."

The farmers have been very busy attending their sugar camps for the past two weeks, and they report the best sugar season we have had for years and the cooler weather at present foretells another good "run."

Mr. James H. Wilson entertained a number of young people from Kitzmiller and Dodson at his sugar camp one night last week.

The Short Run grange is on the boom. Wm. Moore, Worthy Master.

Mr. Tommy Wilson was calling at Upper Potomac last Sunday evening. What's the attraction, Tommy?

Mrs. Daniel Wilson is visiting friends in Kitzmiller.

Messrs. Claude Harvey and J. B. Moore are having quite a racket. The stork visited both homes not long ago, and they can't agree on which is finest child.

Our "good shepherd," who is always so pleasant and jolly, was seen with a very sad face last week. When asked the cause of his sadness he said, "My old belled ewe fell through the mow hole last night and broke her back." To the sorrowing loser we extend our sincere sympathy.

Mr. and Mrs. Z. H. Moon spent Saturday and Sunday visiting Mr. J. H. Wilson.

Mr. G. W. Harvey expects to start in the near feture for the far west.

Mr. Billy Moore was seen once more "on the hill" Sunday night.

Mr. James A. Sincell Chosen to Succeed Mr. A. C. Mason.

Just prior to the adjournment of the Board of County Commissioners yesterday afternoon that body announced the appointment of Mr. James A. Sincell, of Oakland, as Road Engineer to succeed Mr. Alexander C. Mason, who was appointed at the January meeting of the Board and who tendered his resignation shortly thereafter

In connection with the appointment of the new road engineer the Commissioners directed him to have the road supervisors remove from the roads all fallen timber and other obstructions and render their accounts for such service.

Mr. Sincell will enter upon his new duties within a very short time and will devote his energies to the improvement of the county highways.

Miss Cora Wells, of Wheeling, is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Harland L. Jones

Mr. J. J. Hoblitzell, Jr., of Meyersdale Pa., a civil as well as mechanical engineer, was in Oakland a day or two this week on business with the city council and the proposed installation of the water and sewerage system for the the town. While in Oakland Mr. Hoblitzell was the guest of his brother-in-law, Mr. C. F. Hammond.

Col. A. G. Sturgiss, of Oakland, who has been a great sufferer for many months with rheumatism, at times being confined to his home for several days continuously, went to Baltimore Monday morning to receive treatmrnt in Johns Hopkins Hospital. He was accompanied by his son Mr. W. A. Sturgiss, who will return to Oakland this week. The many friends of Col. Sturgiss hope for his speedy recovery and restoration to his usual vigorous health.

Mr. Henry Lauer, proprietor of the Oakland Model Steam Bakery, always to the forefront in making his establishment inviting and giving to his patrons full value for the money expended with him, has added very materially to the appearance of his salesroom and ice cream parlor by having the walls artistically decorated and the wood work freshly grained. In addition to these improvements he is contenplating others that will add to the capacity of his ice cream manufactory as well as his bakery.

The Board of County Commissioners was in session Tuesday and yesterday transacting routine business preliminary to the annual levy laying session of the Board which will be held next month when the yearly expenditures will be computed and appropriations made to cover the same. At the session of the Board held this week nothing of public interest was transacted except the consideration and acceptance of the resignation of Mr. A. C. Mason as County Road Engineer, who tendered it to the Board some time ago.

Ex-State Senator David E. Dick, formerly of Lonaconing, but now a resident of Tunnelton, W. Va , from which point he travels for an independent oil producing company, was in Oakland last Saturday on business connected with the corporation which he represents. Senator Dick, since his removal from Maryland, has not lost any of his old-time vigor and fire along political lines but is as staunch as ever in the support of his political convictions. While in Oakland he interested a number of people in his line of goods and expects to make regular visits to this section at stated periods. He will always find a warm welcome among Garrett countians where he is well known and liked.

State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, who has been residing in Baltimore this winter with his mother and sister, spent Tuesday in Oakland, returning to Baltimore the same afternoon. Senator Brown's purpose in coming to Oakland was to attend a meeting of the Court House Commission and to submit to the Board of County Commissioners the manuscript of a road book containing rules and instructions for the use of the road supervisors of the county, which Senator Brown prepared and which has been endorsed by the Chief Engineer of the Highways Commission of the State. The Commissioners went into a thorough examination of the work of the author and passed upon it as being in accord with the recently enacted road law of the county and ordered a thousand copies printed for distribution. The book will make about thirty pages and is being printed at this office. It will bear the name of the author, Senator Brown, and also the endorsement of the Chief Engineer of the Highways Commission and will be ready for distribution within a few days.

Notice to Road Supervisors.

Supervisors are hereby notified to remove from the roads all fallen timber and other obstructions and render their bills for such service.

HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES.

Exercises Will Be Held in the Oakland Opera House April 2nd.

The graduating class of the Oakland High School, will shortly issue invitations for the graduating exercises, which are to be held in the Oakland Opera House on Friday evening, April 2nd, when a program now in course of preparation, will be rendered.

The class is small, being composed of but three members, Miss Orpah Christina Ashby, and Messrs. Dean Cook Skinner and Mark Sherman White. The program, however, will be an interesting one. As least one gentleman of more than local reputation will have a place upon it and the evening entertainment promises to be a profitable one.

The graduates are among the most popular of Oakland's young people and they have the undivided well wishes of their acquaintances for future success in life.

GRAFTON VOTES "DRY."

Reverses Vote Two Years Ago, When City Went "Wet" by Nine Majority.

Tuesday the annual municipal election took place at Grafton, W. Va., one of the progressive towns of the Mountain State, when the voters, in addition to electing their mayor and members of the city council, also voted on the proposition of license or no license.

For several weeks anti-liquor meetings were held almost nightly and on Tuesday the result of the crusade against the saloon was made apparent when the "dry" element won by sixty-six majority, reversing the vote of two years ago when the saloon supporters won by a majority of nine votes.

Funeral of Dr. Frank Laughlin.

The funeral of the late Dr. B. Franklin Laughlin, whose death occurred at the home of his parents at Deer Park last Tuesday night, took place from the M. E. church at Deer Park last Friday at noon when friends and relatives of the deceased gathered in such numbers as to overtax the capacity of the building, many being compelled to stand in the aisles and on the outside during the services, which were conducted by the pastor, Rev. J. O. Bolton, assisted by Drs. R. B. Ward and W. W. Davis and Rev. Funk of Blaine. A number of Masons were also present from Oakland lodge of which Dr. Laughlin was a member, the fraternity conducting the services at the grave. The Mountain Lake Park quartette furnished the music, three very impressive and beautifully rendered selections being sung. The body of the deceased was carried from the bereaved home to the church by six fellow Masons and there deposited before the chancel when Rev. Bolton read a chapter from the Scriptures and Dr. Ward offered a prayer. Tributes to the memory of the deceased were spoken by Drs. Ward and Davis and by Rev. Funk, the pastor of the Blaine church of which Dr. Laughlin was a member. The words of Rev. Funk carried a message to the hearts of every hearer and impressed every one of his auditors with their sincerity. From the church the body was borne by a relay of bearers to the cemetery where it was encased in a steel vault and buried with the impressive funeral ceremonies of the Masonic fraternity. The floral tributes were many and beautiful bearing testimony to the fact that Dr. Laughlin, though passed way, was remembered by his friends.

THE ELECTRICAL WORLD

POWER OF ELECTRIC WAVES.

Evident Solution of Problem of Wireless Control of Machinery.

The problem of controlling machinery by electric waves has been satisfactorily solved so far as the construction and operation of the necessary apparatus is concerned. The radius of action is small at present, and the attention of inventors must now be focused on this part of the question. The latest apparatus devised for this purpose is apparently that constructed by two engineers of Nuremburg, Germany, Messrs. Wirth and Beck. By means of this, through the medium of electric waves, levers may be thrown forward or backward, upward or downward, steering wheels or cocks may be turned to the right or left, and electrical apparatus may be thrown in or out of circuit—in fact, the most varied machines may be controlled from a distance without any material connection between them and the operator. Says the Electrical Review and Western Electrician:

"At demonstrations recently made of this apparatus before the Nuremberg Society of Natural History and other societies the experimental table contained a plant for receiving electric waves similar to those used for wireless telegraphy, connected to the radiotelegraphic controller and the accessory apparatus actuated by the latter.

"In another room was installed a radiotelegraphic sending apparatus susceptible of being tuned up to the receiver, and actuated by electromagnetic waves from the apparatus installed on the experimental table. No connecting wires were provided between the sending and receiving apparatus.

"Whenever a lever connected with the sending apparatus was adjusted to various positions the apparatus corresponding to these was actuated. A number of electric lamps were thus lighted in any order desired, or in groups, and a small steam engine was started, reversed or stopped, while electric bells and motors were actuated, powder mines exploded, and a revolver fired rapidly.

"While torpedoes can be employed so far only over small distances, it is claimed that it will now be feasible to provide them with a far greater driving power, thus directing them toward their goal with safety and from many miles distance.

"Land and sea mines have frequently been exploded by electricity transmitted by extensive cables between the operator and each of the mines. The same operation can now be effected through electric waves, that is, by wireless means, provision being made so that only the mine in question is exploded. This firing of mines through electric waves is likely to be adopted advantageously by several branches of industrial activity."

ELECTRIC SLEEP

Apparatus of Frenchman Which May Do Away With Ether.

Important experiments have recently been made in Paris by Prof. Leduc in producing electrical sleep. In the majority of tests the subjects used were rabbits, dogs, and other animals, but the inventor himself and a number of his assistants have also been placed under its influence.

The electric sleep is produced by using an intermittent electric current, the circuit being interrupted 100 times per second by means of a revolving disc. This disc is revolved 25 times a second by an electric motor, the arrangement of the disc being such that each time it revolves four interruptions are made.

In placing animals under the influence of electric sleep the method has been shown to be absolutely harmless. It is necessary at first to use a very weak current, the power being increased little by little until the subject falls asleep under its influence. It is claimed that only six volts are required to produce the sleep, and that it will last from three to four hours without harmful effects. When the subject has fallen asleep the current is cut off. In experiments made upon the person of Prof. Leduc himself, he was kept under the influence for 20 minutes at two different times.

Physicians all over the world are watching the experiments with great interest, as it has long been desirable that a safe and satisfactory substitute be obtained for ether.

IN THE WINTER WOODS.

Nature Study Which Will Bring Memories of the Summer Time.

You will add greatly to your pleasure in summer if you do not pick so many of the wild flowers but watch them develop, notice what the fruit looks like after the flower is gone, and then watch to see how each one distributes its seed, for all of these seed receptacles have their own method of fulfilling this all-important mission. Some, like the evening primrose, have their pods open at the ends and so let the wind shake out their seed; others, like the witchhazel, shoot their seed quite a distance from the hard cases, which is done as you would shoot a slippery orange seed by pressing between your finger and thumb. And then there is the cranesbill which throws its seed from a little cup at the end of a spring which you may see even now coiled up with the little cup at its tip.

A walk in the winter woods spent in identifying your friends of the summer by their dried pods or their seed, says St. Nicholas, will prove a most enjoyable and profitable pastime.

A coal handling plant, which contains a novel device to pick up a small coal boat, elevate it about 60 feet in the air, and turn it upside down to discharge the coal, is being erected in Buffalo.

GIANT ELECTRIC CRANE

It Is Designed for the Handling of Heavy Logs.

This electric derrick crane, designed for handling heavy logs, is located on the river bank at St. Louis. It lifts logs from the water and deposits them in neat piles in the lumber yard.

The crane has an effective radius of 75 feet and a lifting capacity of five tons. The electrically driven trolley travels between the latticed girders of the jib, an enclosure being provided for both the operator and mechanism. The derrick is equipped with three direct current motors which operate the three movements of the crane.

The hoisting speed is 60 to 120 feet per minute, the traveling speed of the trolley, 125 feet to 150 feet per minute, and the swinging speed two revolutions per minute. The mast is 60 feet high.

HER HOODOO

By HAROLD KINSABBY

(Copyright, by Shortstory Pub. Co.)

It was because the doctor insisted that my system needed ozone that I went to Colorado on a hunting trip. It was there that I met her, and it was there, by the way, that I became convinced that when a man with a lame lung undertakes to hunt ozone in the wilds of the Rocky mountains he ought to provide himself with a guide. I went alone, and that's why I got lost.

For two days I had tramped, half starved, toward the rising sun, with the hope of reaching some cattle ranch near Denver. On the morning of the third day, as I was trudging through a thick undergrowth, I was suddenly startled by a woman's voice:

"You didn't happen to spy a little speckled heifer back yonder, did you stranger?"

It is said that upon the approach of a human being the first impulse of a man who has been lost in the woods is that Biblically ascribed to the wicked, namely, "to flee when no man pursueth." But at this time I was too far gone with hunger and weariness to flee from anything.

I simply leaned against a tree trunk and awaited the appearance of the voice's owner. She came riding a broncho across the crest of a hillock. She was slight and wiry, and she wore her huge sombrero and man's canvas shooting-coat with an air that at first suggested the cowboy. A later glimpse of feminine drapery, however, proclaimed her something infinitely more interesting—a real Rocky mountain cowgirl in all her glory.

"No," I answered weakly to her repeated question as to the heifer's whereabouts. "No, I've seen neither hoof nor hide of your heifer, which is lucky for you, as I should probably have eaten it if I had."

"You do look hungry," said the strange horsewoman; and as she spoke the bold lines of her aquiline face relaxed into an expression of womanly solicitude.

"Here, take this," she added in a businesslike tone, producing from a bag that lay, meal sack fashion, across her saddle, a can of pressed beef and a square foot or so of corn bread. "No," as I tried to speak, "never mind explanations. Have some lunch with me and talk afterwards; that is, if you ain't afraid to eat with a cowgirl.

"You see," she continued, when we were comfortably seated on a moss-grown log that served as a whole set of dining room furniture, "I know myself what it is to get lost and nearly starve to death. 'Having experienced misfortune myself, I know how to pity others.'"

I choked over a morsel of corn bread and stared at my companion with fill-bred astonishment. A cowgirl who quoted Virgil, even in a translation, was something not dreamed of in my philosophy.

"Yes, I don't wonder that you look surprised," said my hostess good-naturedly. "I suppose I don't look as though I was up in the classics, but the fact is I'm a graduate of Iowa Wesleyan university, and I've studied Latin, Shakespeare, geometry, and all the rest.

"Yes," musingly, "once I expected to pursue a literary career. Indeed, my professors all told me that I might become the George Eliot or Mrs. Browning of America. But that speckled heifer I was asking you about just now knocked all my plans into a cocked hat."

"How was that?" I asked.

"Well, it was like this," said the cowgirl college graduate, as she pushed aside her corn bread, untasted, and planting her elbows upon her knee propped her chin upon her palms, man fashion. "In the spring of 1885, several years after I had graduated, my father died, and mother and I came to Colorado and bought a ranch at Plum Creek, some 23 miles south of Denver. You see, my father had been an invalid, and ever since I can remember we'd been chasing round from pillar to post, trying to find a climate that agreed with him; so this was really what you might call the first chance I had to go to work in earnest. It was a lovely quiet spot, an ideal place, I thought, for communing with nature and pursuing a literary career. But it was not so to be. Like—what's his name with a tender heel?"

"Achilles?" I suggested.

"Yes, like Achilles, I had one weak spot that was going to be my ruin. I was crazy about pets. Why, if it hadn't been for that weak spot I might be wearing literary laurel instead of lassoing cattle—but this is neither here nor there. What I was going to say was that before I'd been settled on that ranch three days some men came our way driving a herd of Texas cattle to Denver, and, as a late snow storm came up just then, they decided to camp on good feed in the hills in front of my ranch. That afternoon they came over to our house to buy bread, and while they were there they mentioned to me that they had a nice cow that had just calved, and offered if I would buy the cow to throw in the calf, as they were just going to kill it. Well, here was where my weak spot came in. No sooner did I hear about those animals than nothing would do but that I should have them for pets. Besides, the cow was offered mighty cheap, only $18, while I'd been going without milk rather than pay the fifty or seventy-five dollars asked for a milch cow; so now I thought was my chance to close a good bargain and get two nice pets, beside. Yes, sir, I even planned while the men were gone after those animals how I would domesticate them in a few days."

"And it took longer?" I asked.

"Domesticate! I might as well have tried to domesticate an active volcano—but I mustn't anticipate.

"My first impression of my pet cow wasn't exactly encouraging. I had imagined her ambling serenely up to the house, mild-eyed and gentle, with the little calflet trotting at her side. Instead, she was dragged upon the scene by four men who had spent at least an hour in catching her and bringing her to me. The calf, meantime, after an equally exciting chase, had been led up and tied to a large plum bush.

"However, I wasn't one to let a little thing like that phase me. I was determined to make friends with that cow; so when, about 200 yards from the house, the men threw her and took off the rope I advanced with that idea. But I wasn't half so anxious to make friends as the cow was. As soon as she set eyes on me—and if ever an animal had the evil eye, that cow did—she made a bee line for yours truly.

"'Look out,' shouted the men. But I was already footing it pretty lively towards the thicket where the calf was tied, the cow after me, snorting like a team engine almost in my ear. The next thing that I knew I had slipped and fallen on the ice in the north side of the bushes with the cow on top. I believe that I tried to grab the creature by her horns, with a wild hope that I might hold her down until the men came to the rescue.

"I might as well have tried to hold down a hurricane. As she rose so did I, and was on my feet 20 yards away before she could see where she was at. Just as she rushed from the bush and lunged after me, I saw a rope swing through the air, and the next thing that devil-possessed cow knew she was tied to a clump of thicket and left to meditate upon the evil of her ways."

"What did the men say to this?" I asked.

"Of course they made out that they were awfully surprised at the cow's antics, fearfully scared at my close call, and all that; but I saw them grinning and chuckling as if they were ready to burst as they rode off, and I felt dead sure they'd planned to have a double funeral, cow and calf both, if they hadn't found a tender-foot to unload them on.

"However, I never was one to give in that I was beaten by anything, first off, especially by a cow. Besides, that idea of having two nice pets had got a great hold on me. I made up my mind that if kindness could reclaim that erring cow she should be coddled like an infant. So next morning, bright and early, I started for the plum bush where she and the calf was tied, determined to make peace. Fortunately, two gentlemen, who had heard of the episode of the day before, rode over to see me that morning and joined me on my peace-making expedition. No sooner did the cow see me within 30 feet of her than she gave a fearful surge; the rope that she was tied with—worn thin by rubbing against the tree all night—gave way, and the cow made for me as though 50 devils had taken possession of her and were urging her on.

"I tell you I didn't stop to think about the power of kindness on the brute creation. I simply yelled, 'Murder,' and made for a sand gulch near by as though a band of wild Indians were on my trail. As I reached the gulch and dropped ten feet or so down the steep bank, digging my heels into the loose sand to stop myself, that acrobatic cow sailed straight over my head and lit about twenty yards below. At first I thought that she was dead, but no such luck. In a moment she got up, looking foolish and dazed, but very much alive, and began shaking her head and pawing fiercely, when the two gentlemen reached down and lifted me out, as much as to say, 'This is what I'll do to you when I get hold of you.'"

"Which she didn't, I hope," I put in.

"No, indeed; you can be precious sure that I took particular care that she didn't have another chance to get hold of me or to get back into the yard again. For an hour or so after she had hoisted herself out of the gulch she stood outside the fence that separated the yard from the field, shaking her head and pawing whenever she saw any of us at the doors or windows. At last, towards evening, she trotted off with a zigzag wabble down the bank towards the creek among the willows, and there she lay in ambush, you might say, so that for a week after we didn't dare to go down to make a garden or do anything else, for fear of having that cow descend like a wolf on the fold."

"And after that week?" I inquired.

"Well, finally she grew bolder, and ventured on the mesa near the railroad track, where she made war on the section hands, and I was warned that I must take her out of the field or they would shoot her. So to prevent her from demoralizing the entire neighborhood I had her killed and used her for beef. And tough eating she was," said my hostess, laughing; "but in any case she was better dead than alive, for there wasn't room for that cow and me in the same country."

"But you've been telling me about the cow. What about the heifer? I thought that you said that she was the cause—"

"Oh, yes. The heifer was the calf. Now, whether the cow disowned the calf, or the calf the cow, I never found out. Anyway, the day that the cow disappeared into the bottom land that little calf trotted up to the house and tearfully begged to be loved. Well, you might have thought I'd had enough of pets for one while, but, no; the helplessness of that poor little calf so went to my heart that for weeks I rode nine miles eevry day for milk, and fed it to that little creature with my own hands."

"A sort of foster-mother," I suggested.

"Yes, I was a mother to that little orphan calf. But, if you'll believe me, it was a case of 'how sharper than a serpent's tooth is an ungrateful child,' or however that goes. Yes, sir, that calf followed in the evil course of its mother, only if anything it was worse, sort of like Agrippina and her son, Nero, only this was a daughter.

"You see, the cow was perfectly open about her evil deeds, but the calf was underhanded. After trotting around me, looking as innocent as though butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, she'd all of a sudden disappear, and come back after a few days with an ear torn and the skin raked off her side; and pretty soon I'd hear that she'd been attacking horses or fighting other cows.

"One day she chased an unlucky workman out onto the railroad bridge and kept him there until a train came along and the engineer slackened enough to take him on and carry him to Plum Station. Another time she got after a tramp that was camping on the bottom land among the willows, and forced him to take refuge in the forks of a crooked tree, where he roosted until one of us went down and called off Miss Bossie. In fact, the only return that calf ever made for all my loving care was to scare away tramps. If I could have kept her around the house just for that purpose she would have been one of the best investments I ever made.

"But as years went by that calf became more abandoned to evil. She would wander farther and farther from home, until now I spend half my nights worrying about her and more than half the day following her up and taking her home with me."

"I should think you'd get rid of the creature," I interrupted.

"Kill her? Yes, I suppose that would be the most sensible thing to do, but you know how it is about always loving the prodigal son the most. Yes, sir; wherever that animal goes it takes my heart with it, and, though it's nigh onto eleven years old, I never can think of it as anything but a pet calf."

"And so it was bringing up that heifer that interfered with your literary career?"

"Interfered? Well, I should say so! Back at the start I did publish some poems in the local papers, and I read one or two essays at the Zion church literaries. But people wouldn't believe they were original. No woman, they said, who spent her time chasing wild cows over the country could write odes to spring and essays to Shakespeare.

"My literary career was killed, blighted in the bud. And, as my income was small and I had to do something to make out a living, I've just turned by hand to anything that came along.

"Instead of gaining fame as the American George Eliot, I've been called Colorado Cowgirl and Broncho Buster. Instead of wielding the pen, I've driven a four-horse stage, branded cattle, broken saddle horses, sung in a church choir, run a blacksmith's shop, kept school, given music lessons, run a hotel, taught painting, carried mail, roughed it on horseback all the way from Colorado to Oregon, and taken a hand in pretty much everything else, except shoveling wind off the roof. But there"—breaking off suddenly—"you aren't interested in all this. What you want now is rest and shelter.

"Take my outfit and make tracks for Wilkins ranch. Just give the pony his head and he'll land you all right.

"It's over that way," rising and gesturing toward the southeast.

I tried to protest against this plan, but the Colorado cowgirl was already several yards away.

"That's all right; meet you later at the ranch," she cried, turning for a moment before she plunged into the thicket. "But first," she added with almost maternal solicitude, "I think I'll just look around and see if I can't find that little speckled heifer."

Her Objection.

Quaint are the comments of the few remaining southern mammies upon the modern styles of dressing. One old mammy called upon the daughter of her former owner one hot afternoon. Glad to see the familiar face again, the mistress of the house welcomed her heartily.

"Why, mammy," she said, "you've got on a new dress and it's all in one piece—why, mammy, you've got a regular modern princess dress."

"Yas, honey," said the old woman, standing up complacently. "I ain't much foh style, but this heah style do suit me. I neber did believe in the dividation of body and soul at the waistline."—Bohemian.

Large Sum for Dickens' Pen.

For some days there has been in a glass case on the mantelpiece of Messrs. Sotheby's in Wellington street a quill pen such as you can buy for a penny. This particular one, however, brought 4,680 pence yesterday, or £19 10s. It had belonged to Charles Dickens, and is said to be that which was used at the last when he was writing "Edwin Drood." It was taken from the novelist's table at Gad's Hill by his eldest son.—London News.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY Valentine Song.

SAID HE:

"If you will be my Valentine
And brew my evening tea for me,
I'll toast you in the sparkling wine
And shield you till eternity!
The rude and biting winds of life
Shall never touch you as my wife!

"If you will be my Valentine,
My love for you shall never die,
As constant as the stars divine
My heart shall be as years go by!
No jarring note shall ever be
When you are frying steak for me!"

SAID SHE:

"If I should be your Valentine
And brew your evening tea for you,
Will you toe always to the line
And praise my biscuits and my stew?
Will you forswear affinities
And other femininities?

"If I should be your Valentine,
You need not die for me at all
But will you, e'er we rise to dine,
Get up and build 'em when I call?
If you will sign this vow 'on sight,'
I'll be your Valentine to-night!"

CHORUS:

(she) (he)
"Oh, he will be my Valentine,
(I) (his)
And she will be my lady fair
And we shall live on love and wine
Without a thought of woe or care!
(he)
For she has promised to be mine,
My Valentine! My Valentine!"

Power of the Press.

Newspapers have made presidents and bustles, happiness and sin, marriage and alimony. They have bolstered empires and rag carpets. They have fed curiosity and goats. They have (w)rapped the good and the bad, the workman's lunch and the drunkard's beer. They have used men for footballs and by men have been used for the same purpose. They have polished readers and windows. They have cleaned chimneys, started fires and stuffed sofa pillows. They have "cut ice" and been cut into pantry-shelf covers. They have caused pain and calked panes. They have built empires and skinned umpires. They have made friends and ridiculed enemies. They have sunk fortunes and made men famous, married widows and curtained windows. They have been born of a shirt-tail full of type and a hay-press, lived and flourished on hot-air and thank-yous. Sometimes I wonder at their constitution. They have starved and thrived, fasted and smiled, parched and bloomed, dried up and borne fruit—but this paper hasn't the recipe and if some of the back subscribers don't pay pretty soon, the editor is going to rise up on his hind legs and roar! We need kind words and money, a pair of overalls and a new typewriter ribbon. If you are out of kind words, typewriter ribbons and overalls, come on with the money! It will be a shock, but we are going to stand it if we bust a tug!—Uncle By.

Idlewild Thoughts.

World Peace Fast Becoming a Reality.

By Lady HENRY SOMERSET, English Reformer.

AMONG perhaps the most hopeful signs of progress at the present time is the fact that, while we are learning, and justly so, to place an ever increasing value on the development of the individual, we are learning at the same time that IN CO-OPERATION LIES THE SECRET OF POWER, and the basis of this co-operation is becoming worldwide.

We are no longer content, nor is it possible to be so, with the advance of our own nation.

THE INTERNATIONAL IDEAL IS FAST BECOMING REALIZED.

There have been held recently no less than three international congresses—at Berlin that of the interparliamentary union, in London the first moral education international congress and at Oxford the international congress of religions.

At the first named Prince von Bulow said in part, "Love of peace cannot signify lack of patriotism."

THOSE ARE PATRIOTS WHO STRIVE TO PREVENT CONFLICTS BY COMBATING IGNORANCE, WHICH IS ALWAYS MISCHIEVOUS; RANCOR, WHICH IS SO UNWHOLESOME; HATRED, WHICH IS OFTEN BLIND, AND AMBITIONS, WHICH ARE SOMETIMES MISGUIDED.

IN ACTING THUS YOU ARE PERFORMING AN ACT OF PATRIOTISM—A PATRIOTISM WHICH CLEARS THE AIR, REMOVES OBSTACLES AND SO RENDERS MORE SMOOTH THE MARCH OF HUMANITY TOWARD THE COMMON IDEAL OF ALL AGES AND ALL PEOPLES.

Side by side with students who are discussing the origin and the evolution of man's beliefs are those who are facing the problems of the daily needs of our future citizens.

We must leave these antiquities to antiquarians. They may trace the degrees by which "man has made his gods," but the revelation is forced upon us that GOD HAS BEEN AND IS STILL MAKING MAN AND WORKING SLOWLY, BUT SURELY, TOWARD THE FEDERATION OF THE WORLD.

We Must Be Dignified but Courteous to Other Nations.

By President ROOSEVELT.

I WISH to see this government able to hold its head aloft in the presence of the outside world. I wish to see it able to withstand any movement of aggression made against it and in return scrupulously careful to treat all other nations with the justice and good feeling which we demand that one individual shall show another.

I HOLD THAT THE INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS OF NATIONS SHOULD BE APPROACHED IN PRECISELY THE SAME SPIRIT IN WHICH WE APPROACH THE ORDINARY DUTIES OF INDIVIDUALS AS AMONG THEMSELVES.

A man has no business to suffer imposition. He is not a man if he SUBMITS to insult and wrong, and neither is he a man if he INFLICTS wrong upon or insults any one else. I hope to see the conduct of the United States toward other powers always MODELED ON THAT PRINCIPLE.

We must do our duty abroad, but even more important is it to do our duty at home, and we can do our duty at home only if we show ourselves true to the principles which this government was founded to uphold.

The National Credit Must Not Be Left Unguarded.

By JAMES J. HILL, Railroad President.

FEDERAL powers and the force of public opinion have been enlisted to prevent the future waste of the nation's resources. Now, one resource, among the mightiest of all, has not been included in the list because it is not material, but intangible.

I refer to the NATIONAL CREDIT, that potent force to which we appeal in times of war or other great national crises and which should be RESERVED for issues of NATIONAL LIFE AND DEATH.

OF ALL OUR RESOURCES, PERHAPS, THIS ONE SHOULD BE GUARDED WITH SOME JEALOUS CARE—FIRST, BECAUSE OF ITS RELATION TO NATIONAL EXISTENCE, AND, SECOND, BECAUSE WE CAN NEVER KNOW IN ADVANCE WHERE EXHAUSTION BEGINS.

Some of the more enthusiastic advocates of waterways have made the mistake of urging that the national credit be pledged to UNHEARD OF AMOUNTS in order that we may complete the whole work at once. It is a reckless, foolish and, I may almost say, A CRIMINAL POLICY.

Photograph copyright, 1908, by C. A. Zimmerman.

One bill before congress recently proposed to appropriate at once $50,000,000 for the work and authorized the president whenever the funds in hand fell below $20,000,000 to sell bonds enough to raise them again to $50,000,000 and repeat this process indefinitely.

This would take the limit off altogether and make the waterway expenditure equal to the PLEASURE of the executive and the POWER of the nation to borrow.

Others have proposed total appropriations ranging from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, the money to be obtained by issues of bonds to that amount.

If we once embark on this policy in national affairs, where the connection between the appropriating power and the tax collector is so loose and little realized, we shall scarcely stop short of NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO OUR FORESTS WILL BEFALL OUR CREDIT AND THE NATION BE LEFT STRIPPED OF HER LAST DEFENSE AGAINST THE DAY OF POSSIBLE EXTREMITY.

GREAT MOUND WILL BE SAVED

West Virginia Legislature Appropriated $15,000 to Buy Monument.

Standing seventy feet high, 900 feet in circumference with trees growing on it over seven hundred years old, the mammoth mound at Moundsville, W. Va., located on the Grave Creek Flats near the Ohio river—the greatest monument of antiquity in the Ohio valley and a tremendous memorial of the original life of the prehistoric people will be purchased by the people of West Virginia.

At the session of the state legislature just ended, following unceasing activity for 20 years, the state appropriated $15,000 with which to save the mound from the ravages of modern commercialism and Governor Dawson approved the bill before leaving the office. This sum together with a donation of $5,000 from the McFadden heirs, the owners of the property and a similar donation from the school children of the State is sufficient to secure the Mound for the State.

A quarter of a century ago the late G. S. McFadden purchased the mound to prevent it being sold to a German who knew the value of the spot for a popular resort and intended placing a saloon on the summit. Several months ago the heirs of McFadden served notice that they had held the Mound as long as possible and it would be sold at once. The State officials secured an option on the property and finally appropriated a sufficient sum to purchase the Mound.

The Mound at Moundsville is the largest in America and was discovered by Joseph Tomlinson in 1770, the first pioneer settler in that section of the country. Standing in a broad valley of 4,000 acres it afforded a view of the surrounding country for several miles.

Relative to the age of the Mound, little is known. Tomlinson, the discover, stated that when he discovered it and first mounted its summit, then ninety feet high, the timher on the mound was as large and as dense as any of the surrounding forest. At that time some of the trees bore names and dates one of the latter being 1734. A gigantic oak tree, felled some years afterward on the summit of the Mound was centuries old.

Even conjecture cannot point to the time when the mammoth Mound was erected by a by-gone people. It may have been old when Cheops was being built by a half million men or when Cleopatra's Needle was being fashioned. Certain it is that the Mound was erected by a prehistoric race who were very similar to the Egyptians ruled by some monarch who had sufficient control to combine vast numbers of them in a huge undertaking.

In 1838 the Mound was opened by its owner by excavating a passage way from the north side of the Mound toward the center. At a distance of 100 feet from the center two skeletons were unearthed in a vault crudely constructed with unhewn timber and loose stones common in that neighborhood. One of the skeletons was surrounded by 650 ivory beads and an ivory ornament about six inches in length.

A shaft was sunk from the summit of the mound to meet the drift and at a point of 34 feet above the vault first discovered was another containing a skeleton which had been ornamented with copper rings, plates of mica and bone heads. History does not record whose silent tomb this was, and, it remains for another Champolion to exercise his ingenuity in ascertaining the period of erecting and the uses of these monuments.

Probably the most interesting curio taken from the Mound in 1838 was a stone engraved in unknown characters resembling those used by ths Scandinavian priests before the introduction of the Roman alphabet. It has attracted more attention from scientists and antiquarians at home and abroad than any other relic of the vanished race found in America. The characters are conceded to be of European origin and if this be true it is evidence that other Europeans visited America before Christopher Columbus.

Powell the antiquarian, concerning the stone and its inscriptions says: "Four of the characters corresponds to the ancient Greek, four to the Etruscan, five to the Norse, six to the Gaelic seven to the old Erse and ten to the Phoenician." The characters used are those of the ancient rock alphabet consisting of right and acute angled strokes used by the Pelasgi and other Mediterranean people and which is the parent of the modern Runic as well as the Bardic.

Absent-Minded Alderman.

A Lynn (Mass.) alderman at a recent aldermanic meeting inquired what had become of an order he had introduced some time before calling for an arc light on Willow street. The city clerk, after digging into his files, informed him that the order had come before the board nearly a month previous and that he had voted against it.

Objectionable.

"I wouldn' objeck to de man dat keeps talkin' all de time," said Uncle Eben, "if he didn' insis' on th'owin' in a question every ten minutes or so dat you's got to answer to show you's keepin' awake."—Washington Star.

Full Beards for Farmers.

The protection of farmers and others who are exposed to the heat a great deal is a serious and difficult matter. Cancer is on the increase, and farmers furnish a large proportion of the cases many of them being due to the direct effects of sunlight on the face and hands. A full beard for the farmer is most desirable for his protection.—North American Journal of Homeopathy.

QUARTERLY REVIEW

Sunday School Lesson for March 21, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Covering the first nine chapters of the Acts.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"And they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word."—Acts 8:4.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

The period of the past quarter's lessons extends over about ten years.

Three eras are considered in the lessons of the quarter.

1. The two powers through which the work was accomplished: the ever-living Saviour and the Holy Spirit.

2. The church at Jerusalem, developing in four directions.

3. The church extended to six different places named.

The map will help us to understand the situation.

The principal persons with whom we have been concerned: The eleven apostles, especially Peter and John; the seven deasons, especially Stephen and Philip. Accredited by miracles in the name of Jesus. Barnabas, a liberal giver. The members of the Sanhedrim, chief priests, Sadducees, scribes—bringing opposition from without. Ananias, Sapphira and Simon Magus—dangers from within. A lame beggar, Ethiopian prince, Aeneas and Dorcas—examples of persons helped. The great and increasing multitude of believers.

Constantine's motto "In hoc signo vinces," "By this sign (of the cross) thou shalt conquer," is true of the church in all ages.

No church or body of men which denies the divinity and continued existence of Jesus has ever been largely successful in spreading the gospel, or building up the religious life.

The Holy Spirit coming with new power and abundance, because the coming of the Son of God has made the greatness of his work possible, is the other force by which Christianity has made its conquests.

His presence was made manifest to the senses so that people would realize the fact and the nature of the power which transformed the character of the people, and multiplied the number of the disciples.

Relate the stories of the Ascension, the Promise, the Prayer Meeting, the Day of Pentecost.

Note the growth of the church in four directions.

1. The tranformation of character, seen in the apostles, notably in Peter; and point out the incidents which show what that change was. Seen also in the character of the first Christians. Seen also in their action under persecution.

2. Growth in numbers. Note the expressions which show this progress.

3. Growth in organization. Give the most marked instance.

4. Growth in extent of country reached by the gospel.

Difficulties and How They Were Overcome.—State the obstacles in the way of this progress, and how they were overcome—from without, from within. Name the various incidents which illustrate and express both the difficulties and the way the early Christians overcame evil with good.

Literary Test Review.

We give below a literary test review which will prove interesting. The list of quotations which were either suggested by incidents in the first nine chapters of Acts, covered by our lessons, or naturally suggest them.

Not on one favored forehead fell
Of old the fire-tongued miracle,
But flamed o'er all the thronging host.
—Whittier, in "The Meeting."

Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne;
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own.
—Lowell, in "Present Crisis."

For no falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper, but returns
Of force to its own likeness.
—Milton, in "Paradise Lost."

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.
—Richard Lovelace.

In youth, beside the lonely sea,
Voices and visions came to me;
In every wind I felt the stir
Of some celestial messenger.
—T. B. Aldrich, in "Sea Longings."

The friendly flames of the spring sun
Glanced like the tongues of fire, beheld by apostles aforetime.
Longfellow, in "Evangeline."

Tongues of the dead, not lost,
But speaking from death's frost,
Like fiery tongues at Pentecost.
—Longfellow, in "Song of the Silent Land."

The baptism of the Holy Ghost.
—Whittier, in The Meeting," 186-191.

Stood before him glorified,
Shining and tall and fair and straight
As the pillar that stood by the Beautiful Gate.
—Lowell, in "Vision of Sir Launfal."

Thou hast been Queen Candace
And Helen of Troy, and shalt be
The Intelligence Divine.
—Longfellow in "Helen of Tyre."

A four-foot coal seam yields 6,000 tons an acre.

Surely Record for Term of Service.

An old servant has just died at Lisburn, England, in the person of Susan O'Hagan, who had been in the service of one family for 97 years. She had been with four generations of the family, and had nursed three. For some time past she had been frail, but enjoyed good health and the full use of her faculties, and could sew and knit without the aid of glasses.

Neuralgia from Eye Defects.

Ninety per cent. of the neuralgic headaches are atributed to eye defects.

Usefulness of the Aeroplane Will Be Limited.

By Professor WILLIAM H. PICKERING, Astronomer.

IT IS DOUBTFUL IF AEROPLANES WILL EVER CROSS THE OCEAN, AND, IN SPITE OF THE RECENT SUCCESS OF THE WRIGHT BROTHERS, THEY OFFER LITTLE MENACE TO AN ARMY IN TIME OF WAR.

The Wright brothers have been so successful that the public has been led to OVERESTIMATE the possibilities of the aeroplane. People have pictures of themselves sailing through the air at a rate of several hundred miles an hour. They imagine that in another generation they can fly over to London in a day.

This is manifestly IMPOSSIBLE, because every time you double the speed of an object passing through the air you have to overcome a resistance four times greater than that which it has been meeting. And as it requires twice as much power to move the mechanism in doubling the speed it means that you must develop eight times as much energy to overcome the multiplied resistance and attain the additional speed. An aeroplane grows less and less efficient the larger it is made.

IN WAR THE AEROPLANE HAS TWO USES. FROM IT THE DISPOSITION OF THE ENEMY'S FORCES CAN BE DETERMINED AND EXPLOSIVES CAN BE DROPPED DOWN ON THEIR HEADS.

For the first purpose it should be rather valuable. At a height of 1,500 feet the operator would have some percentage of chance of getting back to his own lines alive. As for dropping dynamite sticks down the necks of his foe, that wouldn't be easy. A dynamite stick dropped on the deck of a battleship wouldn't prove so very disastrous. It might if tossed down the smokestack, but that would require a pretty accurate eye. So far aeroplanes haven't shown much promise of carrying projectiles weighing more than 150 pounds. After discharging one the aeroplane might go back for another missile, however.

It is likely that the aeroplane's ONLY USE in this way would be in destroying railroad bridges and interrupting traffic. If it became a factor in warfare the probability is that the nations would come to an agreement about destroying cities. On the whole, it doesn't seem to be a very economical method of making war.

Who Is the Patriot of Today?

By Bishop CHARLES E. CHENEY of Chicago.

PATRIOTISM is the spirit of sacrificing oneself for the highest good of the nation.

We need patriots of this sort in the critical times in which we are living. Who is the patriot of today?

HE OR SHE WHO IS WILLING TO SACRIFICE EASE, COMFORT, ENERGY AND TIME TO GRAPPLE WITH THE GREAT EVILS WHICH WE ALL ACKNOWLEDGE HAVE DEVELOPED LIKE PARASITIC GROWTHS UPON THE TREE OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

The patriot of the present time is the man of business who will SACRIFICE HIS MONEY GETTING to devote to the solution of the problems affecting the public welfare the sagacity, integrity and the untarnished honor which have made his business a success.

The patriot is not of necessity the man who carries a gun. With equal truth the patriot is not to be found among the men only.

The patriot of the present is the woman who, maintaining the traditions of her ancestry, throws the POTENT INFLUENCE of her sex into the scale opposed to the senseless luxury, the reckless extravagance and the tawdry parade of wealth which are characteristic features of American life today.

The patriot of today is the woman who CHERISHES as the most precious of her treasures the lofty ideals of the SACREDNESS OF THE FAMILY AND THE HOLINESS OF THE MARRIAGE TIE which she inherits from the women of the Revolution and who dares to brand with the hot iron of her reprobation the theories which are sapping the foundations of American society.

Importance of Maintaining Foreign Trade.

By GUSTAV H. SCHWAB of the New York Chamber of Commerce.

THE time has gone by when the manufacturers of this country can afford to regard the matter of export to foreign countries as an expedient emergency in times when home trade is dull. The manufacturers have begun to realize that, though they may get into foreign markets with their astute business methods and their up to date goods, that is not ALL they have to do. They have to take very good care to RETAIN those markets and to see that they are not allowed to go into other hands, as has been too often the case. It has too often been the habit of the manufacturer here to send out his goods and seize hold of foreign fields as EMERGENCY DUMPING GROUNDS, letting the trade SLIDE again so soon as home trade pulled up. While home trade remained good he did not bother about exporting, but times became slack again; there came another slump, and the manufacturer cast his eyes over the seas again.

BUT HE FINDS WHAT HE MUST HAVE KNOWN WAS INEVITABLE IF HE HAD ONLY STOPPED TO THINK—NAMELY, THAT THE FIELD HE HAD FORMERLY SECURED AND LET GO HAS SINCE GONE INTO THE HANDS OF THE BRITISHER OR THE GERMAN, AND ONCE YOU LET A FOREIGN MARKET GO IT IS NOT PICKED UP AGAIN IN A DAY OR IN A YEAR.

The manufacturers have been guilty of A SHORTSIGHTED POLICY, and they are beginning to realize, I think, that they have been shortsighted. They have begun to see that, even in this vast territory of ours, there come occasions when IT IS EXPEDIENT TO HAVE OTHER OUTLETS and to maintain them.

BITTINGER.

The robin was much in evidence last week, but his cheering springtime song has been silenced by a return of winter weather conditions this week.

Mr and Mrs. Manassa Brenneman left their home at this place last Tuesday morning for Kalona, Iowa, where they expect to locate permanently.

Jonas Bittinger lost a valuable cow last week, and Perry Broadwater, a horse.

Miss Lizzie Orendorf, who has had charge of the Duckworth school for the past winter, spent last Saturday and Sunday with her parents at this place.

Miss Lizzie Opel, teacher in the Red Hill school, passed through this village last Saturday on her way to her home.

William Ralston, of Frostburg, spent last week with his sister, Mrs, Thomas Hendershot

Urner Beachy made a business trip to Oakland last Saturday, returning on Monday.

Mr. Holbrook, formerly of Chicago, was the guest of Rev. and Mrs. Yugel of this village one night last week.

Rev. Alvin Yugel, of the Lutheran church, received ten new members into church membership at Jennings last Sunday afternoon.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The special services in the M. E. church are still in progress but will doubtless come to a close with the end of this week. Between twenty and twenty-five have been converted and renewed and the membership greatly revived. Dr. Davis preached Monday night and Rev. J. B. Workman Tuesday night.

Mr. Charles Wilson, of Washington, D. C., was called to the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs Eugene Wilson, last week and is still remaining at the bedside of his father who is rapidly sinking.

Dr. McLain, wife and daughter Kate, of Wheeling, W. Va., who have spent the past winter in Washington, D. C., arrived here this week and are occupying their cottage on G street.

'Squire Kerfoot, who has been ill for several weeks, is on the road to recovery.

Mr. C. G. Hammond has been quite ill for some weeks, afflicted with inflammatory rheumatism.

Merchant Garthright is packing his cold storage room with snow and Messrs. Cuppett, Leighton & Co. contemplate doing the same.

Mrs. Fannie L. Sperry went to Grafton Tuesday morning where she held missionary meetings in the afternoon and evening.

The State Encampment of the Uniform Rank K. of P. will be held here in July. This will bring about one thousand Knights and friends to the Park.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MARCH 25, 1909. NUMBER 4

TO EXTEND C. & O. CANAL TO THE OHIO RIVER

Waterways Commission Take Up the Subject.

A broad and comprehensive plan of dealing with important subject with which it has been charged by Governor Crothers was decided upon Wednesday by the Commission on Waterways and Canals, which met in the morning in the State board rooms of the Union Trust Building. If the plans made by the commission are carried to a successful fruition they will mean much to the people of the State. The governer is greatly pleased with manner in which the commission has taken up the work assigned it, and believes it will produce important results.

At the meeting there were present State Senator Lewis M. Milbourne, of Somerset county (chairman); Mr. Ezra B. Whitman, secretery; Mr. S. A. Williams and Mr. Frank H. Zouck. It was decided to proceed along six lines.

The divisions made by the commission and upon which it is to work are as follows:

First—The extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to join the Ohio river, Maryland to co-operate and combine in carrying out this work with other interested States, such as Virginia, Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio, and possibly the Federal government.

Second—The possibility of regulating railroad rates and controlling railroad discrimination by the development of the natural and artificial waterways of of the State as avenues of commerce to compete with the railroads.

Third—The control of the development of the water power of the State in such a manner as to serve the interests of the greatest number of people and at the same time increase the revenues of the State.

Fourth—The sanitary control of all streams and water ways by the State, especially those streams and waterways used as a source of water supply and also those waterways from which shellfish are taken.

Fifth—The drainage of all swamp lands bordering on streams or waterways which are now useless areas.

Sixth—Investigation of irrigation possibilities for Maryland.

Mr. Whitman, secretary of the commission, has been directed to secure all data concerning the six divisions of the subject possible. Each with separately, and the indications are that the report of the commission to the governor will recommend the introduction of at least five bills at the next session of the Legislature.

MAPLE SUGAR

The Great Staple of Garrett and Somerset Counties.

The Garrett county maple sugar product is one of its most important interests, equal to some of its cereal products. This has been the best season for many years and is still on. Last year was quite a failure. Sugar seasons are something like fruit seasons, alternated by good and poor ones. The seasons usually begin in February but March is the chief month. It can not yet be known what the amount of the product will be this season, but quite large with high prices to the makers, about 10 cents at home.

The largest manufacturer in the county is Mr. Ralph Engle, one of its most prominent citizens. He has two camps, as they are called, near each other. His product this season can not yet be known, but it will run to the ton measurement. The sugar king, so called, is Elijah Livengood, on the Pennsylvania side of the line, with two camps, one in Maryland and the other in Pennsylvania—near each other.

The best known producers in Garrett county are J. J. Beachy, U. Stanton, J. Gnagey, the Boucher camp, W. H. Swauger, the old Brown camp, with many others not recalled. The process, which has been much improved in late years, of making maple sugar might be given, but it would require space and patience of readers. The labor is still difficult, and tedious, but not so laborious and heavy as in past years.

The sugar zone in Garrett county lies chiefly between Meadow and Negro mountains, with a width of 3 or 4 miles, but many more in length, extending far into Somerset county, Pennsylvania. This territory includes fine farms and lands thickly populated. So the owners are doubly blessed. It can be stated that sugar trees are to be found only in mountain regions and cold climates, and not in warm climates.

DEPARTURE OF MR. ROOSEVELT FOR AFRICA

Mid Cheers and Music Distinguished Citizen Sails Away.

NEW YORK, March 23.—Standing on the bridge of the steamer Hamburg, and acknowledging the enthusiastic cheering of thousands of persons who had assembled to bid him goodbye, Theodore Roosevelt sailed for Africa today. He was smiling happily and showed unmistakably his pleasure at the warmth of the demonstration accorded him. Beside him on the bridge stood his son, Kermit, and Capt. Burmeister, commander of the vessel. The big ship left her pier at six minutes past 11 o'clock. She slowly made her way out into the channel amid cheers that completely drowned the music of the bands, which were playing "The Star Spangled Banner."

The distinguished traveler was still on the bridge watching the scene as the vessel was warped out into the stream and headed down the bay on the start on her journey. The cheering continued as long as the ship was within hearing distance. Accompanying the big ship down the bay was the tug John J. Timmins, which had on board a large number of friends of the ex-President, among them many who had been associated with him in his official life.

From his country home at Oyster Bay to the steamship dock in Hoboken, the former President's route resembled a triumphal march. Greetings of crowds gathered to wish him good luck were expressed all along the way in enthusiastic cheers

When he arrived at the Hamburg-American line pier, where he boarded the steamship Hamburg, the ex-President found a densely packed throng of his fellow-countrymen gathered together. As he appeared loud cheers greeted him. He smiled and bowed right and left in cordial acknowledgment of the salutations of the assembiage, and evidently was very much pleased at the warmth and sincerity of the demonstration in his honor.

The crowds on the pier and on the steamer were so great that the ex-President was severely jostled several times. He was not hurt and smiled through it all.

One of the ex-President's last acts before the vessel sailed was to send a message to President Taft. President Taft's good-bye gift to his predecessor was a gold pencil inscribed with the words "Good-bye and good luck."

Mr. Roosevelt gave a short talk to the newspaper men on board the Hamburg. He greeted them at the doorway of his suite.

"Now, gentlemen, I am glad to see you," he said. "What can I tell you?

"Oh, yes. There is the picture," indicating a portrait of President Taft. "It is very interesting and very fine. Don t you think so?

"Oh, gentlemen, there is one thing that I desire very much to have you say for me. There is an immense mass of mail on board this steamship, which has come to me and which I have not been able to open, and much of which I will not be able to open for some time.

"I have no stenographer with me. Since I left the White House I have received about 5,000 or 6,000 letters. Four-fifths of these I have not even seen. My thanks to the people who sent them are, however, none the less.

"Now, I wish you would say for me that it will be only a waste of time for any one to write to me while I am away in Africa. Again, I will say that I deeply appreciate the courtesy of those who have written to me, and take this occasion to give them my thanks."

One of the reporters in the party broke into the conversation with the interjection:

"Some one told me, colonel, you were going to be our next President."

Mr. Roosevelt immediately threw up both hands and exclaimed:

"Good-bye, gentlemen, good-bye."

Found Fish in Tank.

While working about an engine tank in the local yards, Brakeman John Lee noticed a fish swimming about in the tank and he got into the tank and succeeded in catching it. The fish was a gold fish about seven inches in length and weighing about a half pound.

Mr. Lee brought the fish up to the Central Drug Store of Harry D. Comerford, where it was placed in a glass punch bowl. It is supposed that it was drawn through the pipes when very small and got into the tank probably at Oakland, Md., where there are many fish of a like nature in the streams. The fish makes a very pretty ornament. —Grafton Sentinel.

EXPLAINS THE NEW PRIMARY ELECTION LAW

Attorney-General Straus Clears Three Disputed Points.

The complicated nature of the new Primary Election law passed by the last Legislature, and which applies for the first time this year to the 23 counties in Maryland, is such that the Supervisors of Elections over all the State, as well as politicians, are in a quandary as to what to do. Sections of the law cause confusion, and requests for construction of its provisions and instructions regarding them have been pouring in upon Attorney-General Straus.

Mr. Straus Saturday gave out three opinions, all bearing upon this law, to officials in three counties, which opinions clear up at least three of the disputed points in connection with the act. One of these was sent to Mr. Franklin Upshur, counsel to the Supervisors of Worcester county. Mr. Upshur desired information as to the "alphabetical lists of registered voters" called for by the law. After citing the sections Mr. Straus replied as follows:

"The Supervisors of Elections in each county shall cause a complete alphabetical list of all the qualified voters of each election district or precinct of the several counties in the order of their registration to be made. There shall be such a list for each election district or precinct in the country and also for each return judge of each party in each district in the county. Each of these lists shall be certified to by the Supervisors, and each list shall be posted. There shall be only one list for each election precinct or district, and one for each return judge. The expense of making these lists must not exceed $100.

"These lists must be corrected and posted annually, for which the cost must not exceed $20 a year.

"The Supervisors of Election of each county shall also cause to be made additional certified lists as may be required by any political party. That is to say, each political party holding a primary election in the county may obtain from the Supervisors such additional certified lists of registered voters—each list being a copy of the original list—as may be necessary for the holding of primary elections. The political party obtaining such lists must bear the expense of making the same.

"These 'lists'—the original lists—prepared and posted by the Supervisors are not 'books.' The act says 'lists' and not 'books,' and is a list which is to be made and posted. But as the Supervisors are required to furnish additional certified copies upon a requisition of the governing bodies of each of the political parties it will no doubt be more convenient to prepare these additional lists for the use of political parties in book form, and, therefore, such books will, in my judgment, be not only useful, but will facilitate the conduct of the primaries."

A second opinion was to Mr. T. Sangston Insley, counsel to the Board of Supervisors for Dorchester county, to whom the Attorney-General wrote as follows:

"The alphabetical lists of qualified voters required by the Primary Election law of 1908 are complete lists of all the registered voters in each election precinct or district of the county, including, of course, all the registered voters of all parties. It is therefore, not necessary for the supervisors to make an alphabetical list of the voters of each of the parties, as each party may obtain from the supervisors certified copies of the lists of all the registered voters of each election district or precinct in the county, which the law makes it the duty of the supervisors of each county to have prepared and posted.

"I am of the opinion that neither the supervisors of elections nor their clerks can legally receive any extra compensation for the additional work which the new law imposes upon them. They can receive only the compensation provided by law."

The third opinion went to Mr. Thomas J. Hunter, clerk to the supervisors of of Baltimore county, who wished to know their powers under the law to subdivide or create new election districts in the county. Mr. Straus gives his opinion on this point as follows:

"The right to make such subdivision s discretionary with the supervisors, and is not mandatory upon them. If, in their judgment and discretion, they deem it proper to make such a subdivision, they are authorized to do so, but they are not required to do so even though the number of voters in any precinct exceeds 600.

"The section contemplates the making of a subdivision—that is to say, the actual creation and establishment of a new subdivision. The section plainly and peremptorily requires the making of new and complete books of registration, as well as the appointment of new and separate registration officers and judges of election for the new subdivision created."

Revival at Jennings.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I write to inform you that I have just closed a series of meetings at the town of Jennings where the Lord was pleased to greatly revive His work. The whole community was stirred. The membership of the church was greatly quickened and 67 souls professed saving faith in Christ, making 132 in all who have been saved since the year began. The meeting was held in the school building, but we now have over $700 on subscription for a new M. E. church in Jennings, and the building will be pressed to completion as rapidly as possible. To God be all the glory.

Maryland and Oregon Apples.

Mr. Richard Vincent, vice president of the Maryland Horticultural Society, contributed the following article to the Baltimore Sunday Sun of the 21st inst., and as the apple growers of Garrett county are more directly interested in the communication of the vice president of the society than the horticulturists of any other section of the State Mr. Vincent's letter is published herewith as follows:

"In a recent issue of your paper there is an article on fruit growing that is rather misleading for the good of our State. In that issue Mr. Pack, of Oregon, says that apples raised there are the best in the world. If this is so, then why did our Maryland apples capture so many first prizes at the National Fruit Exhibition this winter at Council Bluffs? Oregon had apples there and so did a good many other States. And yet Maryland was in the lead with the same apples that were exhibited in the Fifth Regiment Armory earlier in the winter These apples were repacked and carried West for exhibition. After being on exhibition there they were reshipped East to the Peninsula Horticultural meeting in Wilmington, Del., and exhibited with the Delaware apples. The Delaware and Maryland apples were put in competition there with Western fruit, and a committee of experts appointed to pass upon their merits.

"These experts gave the Delaware and Maryland fruit the premium for the finest flavor, etc. And I therefore contend that Maryland is so far the banner State for the fruit grower. In proof of this we hope to show the world what we are doing at the next annual meeting in December of the State Horticultural Society, and I would kindly invite Mr. Pack or anyone else to bring the best fruit they may have and place it in competition with ours, and if they beat us we will give all honors to them."

Funeral of Chas. Porter.

The funeral of Charles Porter, aged 18 years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Porter, 100 Green Street, who died at the Allegheny Hospital from tetanus on Wednesday night, took place from Emmanuel Episcopal church, Saturday afternoon, and was attended by a large concourse of friends. The rector, Rev. Wm. Cleveland Hicks, conducted the services and the entire vested choir, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Ingham Lord, sang the burial service and several hymns that were favorites of the deceased. The floral tributes were unusually handsome and numerous, many of the youth's comrades and friends sending their tributes in this shape. Particularly touching was the offering from the Emmanuel church choir of which the deceased was a member. The pallbearers were Messrs. Ray Porter, Harry Porter and Guy Felty, cousins of the deceased; and Messrs. Harry Robinson, Clyde Corrigan, Lowery Hady, Hume Annan and Fred Walton. The interment was made in the family plot in Rose Hill cemetery.

The following relatives attended the funeral: Mr. and Mrs. Chris Felty and son, Guy, of Connellsville, Pa.; Miss Mollie Porter, Mrs. George Porter and sons, Harry and Ray, of Oakland, Md.; Mrs. Grant Smith, Graftou, W. Va.; Mrs. W. Frank Keen, Baltimore, Md., and Mr. Wm. Jones, of Washington, D. C.—Cumberland News.

U. S. SOLDIER SHOWED THE METTLE IN HIM

Clifford Ray Stuck, Formerly of Selbysport, Killed Two Deserters.

News reached Garrett county a few days ago from Fort Wingate, New Mexico, of the killing of two deserters from the United States Army by a fellow soldier, a former Garrett countian, Clifford Ray Stuck, son of Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Stuck, recently of Selbysport, but now residents of Pittsburg, Pa.

Young Stuck joined the service at Columbus, Ohio, about seven months ago and was eventually sent to Fort Sam Houston, Texas, and thence to Fort Wingate, New Mexico, where he was attached to Troop N, Third Cavalry. On the day of the shooting he was placed in charge of a garoage wagon and as assistants in the work two captured deserters from the army were placed under him. The wagon was drawn by four mules and after it had been loaded and started for the dump, about two miles distant from the fort, the driver, who was one of the deserters, whipped up the team and caused the mules to run away. While at the topmost speed Stuck's companions jumped from the wagon and attempted to desert. After commanding them to halt, he fired on one with his revolver and on the other with a rifle, bringing both men down, death in both instances ensuing almost instantly.

A trial by court martial was given Stuck and he was exhonerated, the court holding that he acted clearly within the line of duty.

WILL ADHERE TO RULE RIGIDLY

No B. & O. Employe Must Be Seen in a Saloon.

There is no let up in the prohibitory measures, introduced recently by Vice President G. L. Potter, with regard to B. & O. employes, especially trainmen, drinking on or off duty.

Notwithstanding the fixed rule that the use of intoxicants is absolutely forbidden, and repeated warnings that have been given from time to time, several employes have been either suspended or dropped from the service since the new year.

To illustrate what a determined stand the company has taken in this direction, several local men were in Baltimore within the past week, making an effort to secure re-instatement in the service. While awaiting an audience with Vice President Potter in the anti-rooms in the general office, they were asked by the clerk if it was a "whiskey case." "If your's is such," said the clerk, "you might as well not waste time, but leave the office, as Mr. Potter will under no circumstances, re-open such a case, now or ever."

A prominent local official in a recent talk with trainmen, taken out of the service for alleged drinking, is said to have stated: "Any man who works for the B. & O. and goes into a saloon leaves his job on the outside, which can be picked up by a better man, and thus he runs chances of losing it when he comes out of the door to take it up again."

The reason that so many Cumberland division men have been sufferers of the anti-drink edict is that it is said to have become noised on other divisions that no punishment was meted out to men on this division for drinking and to refute this assertion is the intention of the local management to discharge men wherever found guilty of an infraction of the company's rules in this respect.

Elect "Wet" Councilmen.

The election at Fairmont, W. Va., resulted in the choosing of a "wet" council. The license question was not voted on directly but the councilmen favoring license had a majority over those opposed to license of 180. The issue was made on the attitude of the councilmanic candidates on the question. The following were elected: City clerk, E. E. Carskadon, Republican; council, Z. W. Morgan, Republican; A. D. Simon, Democrat; C. Powell, Democrat; J. R. Linn, Republican, and Geo. Brand, Republican. With the holdovers the Republicans have a majority of two in the council. Carl Riggs, Democratic candidate for council in the fifth ward, withdrew at the last moment and qualified as a commissioner of election, leaving the Democrats without a candidate. The first ward voted dry as did the fifth, while the second, third and fourth voted wet. The new council will likely vote for the issuing of license. Fairmont has been "dry" for the past year.

Point Pleasant, W. Va., elected the entire "wet" ticket by large majorities.

A Modern Incompatibility

By Charlotte Wilson.

(Copyright, by Bobbs-Merrill Co.)

They had been engaged a week. The lagoon was blue—bluer than living turquoise; and the long, sweeping lines of the park sward seemed to them considerably greener than emerald.

They seemed quite satisfied where they were, as the man, with long, lazy strokes, brought the skiff around the point of the wooded island. He looked across at her under his tilted hat-brim, his long, brown hands clasped behind his head, his legs crossed.

"Sweetheart," he said, "has it occurred to you that we'll be poor?"

"Often," she said.

His unconscious look of relief alone betrayed a latent anxiety in the question. "You see," he explained, with a queer smile, "I don't know you so very well."

"Nor I you," she retorted. They both seemed strangely undisturbed by the announcement.

"I mean," he continued comfortably, "the You that is the product of heredity and environment. I think I know the essential You very well. O, I know what you're going to say; you know it does go a good way toward explaining a person, to know just how he has been brought up, and how he differs from his brothers and sisters—what he inherits from his father, and what he doesn't inherit that he ought to from his mother. Take me, for instance; I don't think you can really know me without having watched me grow up among my five sisters."

"I might as well give it up, mightn't I?" she asked, paddling in the water with the frivolity of idle happiness. "I don't see how it's to be done."

He smiled. "If we had lived in adjoining houses, now—"

"No," she interrupted. "Then you would remember how I looked when I had the measles."

"I don't know that I should care to have you remember me in dresses," he conceded. "I'm afraid you might never have had the proper respect for me."

"It's an Ideal Diet—a Return to Nature."

Then he smiled a characteristic smile which transformed his long, serious face. "I think, after all, I like best to have discovered you," he said.

"I know I do," she answered with decision. "I shouldn't like to have been thrown at your head, even by Providence. And, though I suppose a man does have to live in an adjoining house to know some things, a woman doesn't. I can reconstruct you and your five sisters at any period of your life. A man has no intuitions, you know," she added, dimpling with amiable arrogance of sex.

"And your intuitions told you I was poor?" he asked.

She nodded.

"They saved me the embarrassment," he said with a slow smile. He was paddling idly in the water, with a hesitation that seemed to her very lovable. She wanted to help him out; but she let him work through the difficulty for the good of his soul. "I've been thinking ever since last Saturday that I ought to talk to you—"

"Don't look so much in earnest," she interrupted. "I'm like David Copperfield's Dora—'can't bear to be talked to seriously.'"

His embarrassed earnestness lifted a little. "Now, you've led me straight to the point," he said. "You—you remember Dora's housekeeping?"

It was her turn to flush now. "I—I didn't say I was like Dora in everything," she protested. "I'm—I'm an epitome of all the heroines in fiction—all the nice ones, that is. You needn't be afraid—" A spark of resentment was beginning to show through her distressful embarrassment.

"Listen," he said. "You misunderstood me. Let me tell you in another way. I have a theory."

"Oh," she said, recovering herself, "if that's all! You're precisely the man I'd suspect of carrying concealed theories! I haven't told you," she said, looking up at him vindictively, "that you're just precisely not the kind of man I intended to marry. You see, since I've been in college, I've met so many—freaks—I verily believe I've been proposed to by a Greek Preposition, pursued by an Economic Theory, and all but captured by a Daily Theme—that finally I said one day to mother, 'Mother, do you mind if I marry a butcher—or a Viking? If I could only find a nice, gory Viking! No intellectual person need apply.'"

"You're trying to distract my mind," he said, with great sternness. "Do you"—he cleared his throat, his bravado deserting him a little, "do you know anything about the raw food movement?"

"Raw food?" she repeated blankly.

"It's an ideal diet—a return to nature in the practical sense," he explained hurriedly. She looked genuinely disconcerted. After all, he did not know her very well. Perhaps he did not at all; the idea of a square meal certainly seemed incongruous in connection with her. She looked as if she got that color as the flowers get theirs. It was embarrassing to be discussing such things so soon; yet hang it!—

"Do you mean raw pork and peanuts—and fish-worms, for instance?" she asked, with a smile which brought the queer, misplaced little dimple at the lower corner of her mouth into full play.

"Not—exactly," he answered, splashing in the water with his paddle. "It's the principle of cooking that's wrong," he explained.

She blushed. She had overlooked that.

"Have you ever tried it?" he asked skeptically, with the amazing audacity of the meek.

"Tried it?" she echoed indignantly. "I don't see how you've found time—while you've been in college," he said, retreating a little.

"One can always find time for what one likes," she retorted. "Besides, I was brought up to know how to do things, on principle. My mother has old-fashioned ideas about such things. And I like it. When my brain's tired there's nothing that soothes it like making noodles. It's a beautiful accomplishment. And one doesn't have to think noodle thoughts the while—though noodle thoughts are very interesting, for that matter."

"I should think they might be," he commented. A deep amusement was dawning in his eyes.

He was so lovable in his slow effort at readjustment that she cried out suddenly: "Oh, man, man! my pretty dreams! the kettle simmering, and—and the nice poached eggs—and the smell of the coffee— the smell of coffee, now, is really poetical—"

"Bless its heart!" said the man with sudden tenderness. "Do you suppose I'm going to object to your having what you want to eat, sweetheart?"

For a moment she was speechless. Then, "Oh! as if I cared what I eat!" she cried, flushed and indignant.

The man stared. "I thought that was what we were talking about," he said humbly.

"One can't explain things to a man," she said with vehement disgust. "When one has no talent one naturally dreams of laying it at the feet of the man one—loves. I've always yearned for somebody to fix for! And to have set your affections upon a man who's above all that—to have no opportunity to develop the natural bent of your genius—"

He had been watching her smile of deep and hidden import. "There are all sorts of nice little salads you can make," he said suddenly.

"Salads?" she repeated, staring.

"Yep. Raw salads. Bananas and nuts and apples—"

"How deliciously indigestible! You don't mean to say that the movement permits of things that are agreeable to the taste?"

He was still watching her under the brim of his hat. "And all the headcranks of my cult say that you must have flowers and things on the table."

She was brightening perceptibly. "I hadn't thought of that," she cried.

"Does that help any?" he asked, with great curiosity.

"Ye-es—immensely," she said. "I begin to see— possibilities—in that movement."

"My future is fairly reeking with possibilities," he announced contentedly.

When they rounded the head of the island again, a little later, a tiny column of pale blue smoke became visible on the right, toward the convent. It was mounting almost straight upward against the amber glow of the late afternoon sky. The little wind had dropped with the sun, apparently giving up its project of luring mortals to its undiscovered country. Perhaps it had decided they were best as they were; for they looked singularly content. The girl's eyes were upon the column of smoke. "What is it?" she asked.

The man pointed out the little campfire on the yellow sand by the water's edge. The figure of a man was bending over it, and a woman in a scarlet golf jacket was moving about at a little distance. Two children were whooping joyously in the foreground.

The girl stood up in the boat to look, in spite of his remonstrance.

"They're cooking supper!" she said. "Oh, how perfectly darling!" She looked around at the jewel-world about them. "It just completes the picture!" she said. "It humanizes the landscape!"

The man grinned self-consciously. "Something smells mighty good," he admitted.

She turned upon him, arrested by the remark, and looked at him for some seconds. Then she clasped her hands. "Oh, my prophetic soul!" she gasped. "It's ham! He likes the smell of it!"

"Don't jump up and down," said the man. "You'll drown us."

That irrational dimple was in full play as she looked down at him. "I think we can get along," she said, nodding at him. "You're nothing but a man, after all. It won't take a serpent to beguile you; you'll just say, 'The woman tempted me, and I did—eat!' All nice men are like that," she added comfortingly.

SHE KNOWS ENOUGH.

She does not know who Caesar was,
Nor when Columbus sailed the seas,
She may, for all she says or does,
Think Botticelli is a cheese!
Now, gentle reader, don't commence
To say you think it is a pity
To live in ignorance so dense—
You see, she's pretty.

She will not wrinkle up her brow
To call to mind a verse of Keats';
Ask her if Shakespeare's writing now,
She'll say she likes the parquet seats'
Of current topics she may speak
And show misinformation simple—
But in the rose-pink of her cheek
There is a dimple.

She'll tell you socialism's cute
Because a friend who's rather plain
Is lecturing from here to Butte
And has so many in in her train;
She cannot tell you what is meant
By the philosophy of Ibsen,
But her's is beauty that is blent—
A Fisher-Gibson.

Of differential calculus
She may discourse in language clear
Until it comes to us
She means some automobile gear;
The fact that Raphael is dead
Leads not to talk on pictures olden—
Her lips are cherry-ripely-red,
Her hair is golden.

So, what is history to her?
What are reformers and their ilk?
She has the latest word on fur
And wears the newest shades in silk.
Sigh not that she must live alone,
For her unlearnedness quench your pity;
She knows all that needs to be known—
You see, she's pretty!

The Captain's Instructions.

The wireless telegraph operator had just sent out his frantic calls for help.

"Did you ask for assistance?" inquired the anxious captain.

"I did," replied the operator. "I just flashed out C. Q. D."

"C. Q. D. What's that?" demanded the captain.

"That's a signal that we need help."

"Great Scott, man! We're sinking. Make it stronger than that. Wire them P. D. Q. This case is urgent."—Detroit Free Press.

HE KNEW.

Mrs. Front—There is only one little hotel in this town, George. Will we have to put up there?

Mr. Front (former hotel clerk)—Yes, dear; just about three times as much as if there were two hotels.—Chicago News.

Squelched.

"It's false!" she cried, in angry tones.
The man looked on in blank despair.
He's sorry now he chanced to note
The other woman's pretty hair.

Nothing Doing.

"'Scuse me, boss," said the unlaundered hobo who had drifted into the private office, "but dey iz t'ree uv us. Can't youse give each uv us a dime fer a night's lodgin'?"

"Get out of here!" yelled the man behind the desk. "Do you mean to insinuate that I look like 30 cents? Fade away!"—Chicago Daily News.

Practical Test.

Bill—I see a left-handed high school girl out in the state of Washington has won in a contest by throwing a baseball 192 feet and 6 inches.

Jill—Why didn't they have a practical test of her skill?

"How's that?"

"Let her throw a rolling pin."—Yonkers Statesman.

In Trouble.

"No," explained a friend, "that's your common sense."

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Planting Things.

I cannot begin to tell you the joy there is in planting things. I do not refer to burying bones, like my bulldog! I mean things that grow and thrive and become a comfort. When I moved from the city to the country a year or so ago, I didn't know much about flora and fauna—that is, when flora is spelled with a lower-case "f," but I was in a receptive mood just as Fitzsimmons was when they asked him if he could read Greek. He replied:

"I don't know; never tried!"

I am confident, too, that Mike, my understudy, didn't know much about flora or fauna, either. Mike is a graduate of a railroad construction gang. He can lay rails to beat the band, insists on planting the garden on a graded straight line and smokes fully as much as the greatest mogul engine that ever made a long hill with a craw full of soft coal.

Last summer Mike came near killing us all off by his pronunciation of the names of rare shrubs and common varieties. He insists still on calling golden glow "golden glue." A bed of iris is a bed of "Irish" to him, presumably as a matter of family pride, although the lilies are blue instead of St. Patrick green. Phlox, too, is "phlux" to Mike. I never yet could catch what he calls nasturtiums and anything he doesn't know the name of is sure to be a "scroob." But for all this Mike is a nature lover of the Simon-pure sort. None of your nature fakes for Mike! He knows the real from the imitation and argued with me thirty minutes the other day when I tried to tell him a linden tree and a basswood was one and the same!

And the things Mike and I are going to place in the ground in the spring is wonderful! Last summer's planting of forty-seven varieties of perennials merely whetted our appetites! We have scoured the woods during the winter months and we know where there are twenty-nine hard maples, six wild cherries, seventy-two elms, five clumps of elders, a dozen willows, including one dog-wood, twelve unclaimed lilac bushes, yards and yards of woodbine, a hundred-odd feet of bittersweet and eight lindens. We agree on all this except the lindens. Mike knows where there are eight basswoods and I know where there are eight lindens. Otherwise there is no difference in our tally sheets.

In the spring we are going to transplant all these with beds and beds of wild flowers like violets (blue and yellow), shooting-stars, spotted adders, phlox and bluebells.

We are out to plant things, Mike and I are! We have a wild grapevine on every post and some tame ones in the valley! The house, under the eaves, is a mine of English ivy, trumpet vines, honeysuckle, matrimony vine and woodbine. There are vines on the fences and on the dog house, including morning-glories, moon-flowers and wild cucumbers. There are trees in the side yard, the back yard, the front yard and in the street. We are starting seeds in the cellar, on the first floor, in the slumber flat and in the attic. We are pouring over seed catalogues with an interest and a vim that presages good business for some nurserymen later in the season. We are primed, loaded and ready to go off at the first call of hesitating Spring! Breathlessly we are studying the thermometer and reading the signs for an early thaw. At the shooting of the first pistle Mike and I will be found "waiting at the church," ready for the fray.

Only I do wish that Mike would learn that golden glow isn't "golden glue," that iris isn't "Irish" and that phlox isn't "phlux." I could forgive him the way he says nasturtium and his obstinancy regarding linden trees, if only he would remember about these popular varieties!

CANDY MADE IN LAYERS.

Delicious Confection to Set Before Your Visitors.

A pure and delicious candy made at home for use at parties may be termed "layer candy." It is made as follows: White layer—Take two cups of granulated sugar, one cup of cream or milk, and a piece of butter about the size of a hickory nut. Put in a pan and boil, stirring all the time, until it forms a soft ball when tried in cold water. Then add flavoring, nuts, and candied cherries or candied pineapple, or other fruit of similar character. Turn out in a deep pan, smooth off the top with a knife which has previously been dipped in cold water. Pink layer—use the same proportions as above, using light brown sugar in place of the granulated, and just before removing from the fire add a few drops of fruit coloring, and a better result will be obtained by flavoring each layer differently. After this layer has been beaten until perfectly cold turn out on top of the white layer and smooth with a knife the same as stated above. Chocolate layer—Process as above, using light brown sugar. When about half done add one-fourth of a cake of chocolate. After beating until perfectly cold, turn out on top of the pink layer and smooth it in the same way as the first two layers were smoothed. Put in a cold damp place so that the layers of the candy will not separate, and when served slice down like layer cake.

PROPER CARE OF DISHCLOTH.

Useful Article That Too Often Suffers from Neglect.

This seems the most uninviting of subjects, yet not more so than the 12x12 crash when it has been forgotten by the little unsophisticated housewife.

There are housekeepers who have delved into corners and excited themselves unduly over surface dust, and some who have waded knee deep into an ocean of theoretic germs, but have overlooked the practical dishcloth. I say it in the singular, advisedly, because they have but one. They use it to the death and then they cremate it in the kitchen range. There follows a brief period of cleanliness, afetr which the old neglect begins.

No woman understands the first principles of hygiene until she has an instinctive feeling that it is best to buy six dishcloths and to treat them to a weekly bath in the regular wash, as she does the tea towels.

Apple Grunt.

This is an old Dutch recipe that has been handed down in our family: Six good-sized apples peeled and sliced, one cup of molasses, one cup sugar, a little salt and cinnamon. Make a dough of one scant pint of flour, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cream tartar, one-half teaspoon salt. Rub one-half tablespoon of shortening into flour and mix with buttermilk or sour milk to make it right to roll. Put one-half of the apples in a deep agate pan or kettle, season with one-half cup molasses, one-half cup sugar, salt and cinnamon. Divide the dough into two parts and roll one-half to size to cover apples. Put in another layer of apples with remainder of molasses, sugar, salt and cinnamon. Cover with other half of dough, with slits cut in top. Put in one cup of hot water, cover closely, and cook on top of stove from 30 to 45 minutes, taking care not to scorch.—Exchange.

Hot Cheese Sandwiches.

A good way to use up dry cheese, either American, pineapple or Edam. The last two grate down to the very rind and are excellent for seasoning. Slice bread that is a day old, thin and cut into rounds. Spread the rounds thickly with cheese, flavor with salt, cayenne and just a touch of Worcestershire sauce. Press two layers together with the cheese between. Have butter melted in your blazer, or if you like olive oil use that instead of butter. Fry the cheese sandwiches golden brown, first on one side, then on the other, and serve piping hot on hot plates. Coffee, ale or beer should accompany these sandwiches.

Cream Puffs.

Melt one-half cup butter in one cup hot water and while boiling beat in one cup flour. When cool stir in three eggs, one at a time without first beating. Drop the mixture on tins in small spoonfuls and bake in moderate oven.

Filling—One and one-half cups of milk, two eggs, four tablespoons flour, sugar to taste. Cook in double boiler.

Another filling—Whip one cup sweet thick cream stir in one cup mashed strawberries, fresh or canned and add sugar to taste.

Fried Apples.

The materials needed are six apples, one tablespoon brandy, one tablespoon lemon juice, one tablespoon sugar, one tablespoon butter. Core and slice apples round; cover with the mixture of lemon, sugar and brandy and soak one-half hour. Fry till soft in the buttter, and when done sift with powdered sugar. These are nice served with cake or hot biscuit.

Smoked Sturgeon Salad.

Remove the brown skin and all the fat from one-half pound of smoked sturgeon, cut into one-quarter-inch cubes; to this add one cup cucumber, three hard-boiled eggs, cut in cubes as above; chop one small pepper fine; also one new onion (there should be one tablespoon of each). Toss together with a fork.

Substitute for Chamois.

Bits of old velveteen are a very good substitute for chamois in polishing articles and are more easily washed.

GRILLING THE CHOP

PROPER COOKING IS A WORK OF SOME SKILL.

To Send Toothsome Morsel to Table in Proper Style Attention to Small Details Must Be Observed.

The cooking of a simple chop or steak demands no small amount of skill if it is to be sent to the table in first-class style. Anyone can throw the one or other into a frying pan, turn it once or twice over the fire, waste the goodness of the lean, impart an unpleasant flavor to the fat and then serve it up, an unsightly, indigestible and unsavory morsel.

Of course, a chop should be grilled, but in many households the necessary clear fire is not always obtainable.

It takes some time to prepare a fire for grilling. When the surface is a red glow all over, without any flame or smoke, then the fire is ready for a grill.

The chops should at least be an inch thick, neatly trimmed. The gridiron must be held over the fire for an instant to warm; then wiped thoroughly with a clean cloth; then rubbed on both sides with a piece of suet, and it is ready for the chop.

This may be allowed to cook on one side for a minute or two. It is then turned, with a pair of cooking tongs for choice. If a fork is used insert it in the fat, and not in the lean. Turn the chop every minute, and it will be done in from ten minutes to a quarter of an hour. The principle involved is this:

The fierce heat of the fire dries the outer fiber of the meat and forms a sort of thin crust or casing. This retains all the juices of the meat, which would escape and be lost were it pierced with the fork.

Where there is no time to prepare a proper grilling fire, a chop can be cooked in front of a fire, though it loses that "flavor of the fire," which is so delicious yet so difficult to describe.

An Edging Plant.

The appearance of pots that contain foliage plants can be much improved if some of the Lycopods or Selaginellas are planted around the edge of the pot. These are often called club mosses and are very decorative when planted thickly.

The one most often used is Selaginella Kraussiana and its close mossy surface is pretty in low fern dishes on the table as well as for a plant edging.

The selaginellas are treated as are ferns and must have partial shade and not be allowed to dry out. They best in a light porous soil with plen of sand.

Bacon and Calf's Liver.

Both bacon and liver should be in thin slices. Fry the bacon and remove it as soon as it is done enough to a hot dish before the fire; flour and pepper the liver and place it in the pan; turn frequently until done, then place a slice of bacon on each slice of liver.

Make a gravy by pouring off the fat and dredging a little flour into the pan; pour in enough water to supply the quantity of gravy desired, add a tablespoonful of lemon juice, boil and pour upon the dish. Garnish with slices of lemon. Time, about ten minutes.

Rice Pone.

One cup boiled rice, two heaping tablespoons fine cornmeal, two tablespoons butter, one cup sweet milk, two eggs, one-half teaspoon salt. Add butter to warmed milk to melt it well, then stir in rice, salt, cornmeal, beating well. Beat yolks and whites separately, adding whites to the mixture last of all. Bake in buttered baking tin in hot oven 30 to 40 minutes to thoroughly swell the cornmeal, making it digestible. Nice for family of boys and to use up left-over boiled rice.

To Obtain Gloss on Pie Crust.

Many a housewife wishes to learn a new wrinkle about getting the rich brown gloss that she has seen on pastry made by professional cooks. The recipe is simple. An egg is well beaten up with a tiny bit of sugar. Add a small quantity of milk, beat well together and with a small pastry brush go over the pie after it is ready to be placed in the oven. Another way and a very simple one to gloss the crust is to rub it over with cold water before baking.

Blitz Kuchen.

One cup of sugar (granulated), one heaping iron spoon butter, three eggs beaten separately, one lemon, juice and grated rind, one tablespoon water, one pint sifted flour (scant), one heaping teaspoon baking powder, one-fourth pound blanche almonds cut fine, one-half cup granulated sugar into which one teaspoonful of cinnamon has been mixed. Pour mix into long greased pan and cover sugar, cinnamon and almonds. is fine and much like coffee bread

Italian Spaghetti.

Half a box of spaghetti, washed boiled in salted water; when co drain in colander and wash in water; drain again. Put into sa pan with one can of tomatoes, a l salt and red pepper. Fry two slice bacon with one onion; add this to mixture and let all simmer one h Turn into baking dish, cover bread crumbs and small pieces of ter and brown.

Wall Street Is the Servant of the Country.

By SERENO S. PRATT, Editor of the Wall Street Journal.

WALL STREET IS SIMPLY A CUSTODIAN OF OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY, A TRUSTEE OF OTHER PEOPLE'S PROPERTY, A STEWARD OF OTHER PEOPLE'S ESTATES. IT IS MERELY THE SERVANT OF THE COUNTRY.

The two billion dollars which are deposited in its banks and trust companies are in reality the DEPOSITS OF THE COUNTRY, and hundreds of millions directly represent the balances of interior banks in New York institutions. The great operations which are carried on in its stock exchanges are in a large part CONDUCTED BY THE PEOPLE of the country. The Stock Exchange is really a national institution. Many of its members are citizens of Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis and other cities, and of the 590 firms represented on its floor 314 maintain 527 branch offices in twenty-nine of the forty-six states of the Union.

In so far as Wall street has fallen short in the performances of its duty it has been for the most part in FAILING TO RECOGNIZE ITS POSITION AS THE SERVANT of the country.

IT HAS BEEN OPEN FAIRLY TO CRITICISM IN THE PAST THAT TOO OFTEN IT HAS ACTED AS IF IT WERE THE PRINCIPAL INSTEAD OF THE AGENT, AND THE OWNER INSTEAD OF THE STEWARD, AND THE BOSS INSTEAD OF THE HIRED MAN.

It has acted as if it owned the money intrusted to its care instead of being merely the trustee of it. Its financial leadership in too many cases degenerated into financial bossism. Moreover, it is also fair criticism to say that Wall street in many ways has been PROVINCIAL in its outlook. There are scores of Wall street men who know the earnings of the railroads and who have at their tongues' ends the statistics of wheat and iron productions and yet who have never crossed the Allegheny mountains or seen the Mississippi river. Admitting all this, however, Wall street has nevertheless DONE THE WORK which the country has cut out for it.

Good Cooking Essential to Happiness.

By ARCHBISHOP IRELAND.

WOMEN, beautify your homes. I say women because men have no sentiment for such. Keep your house in order, the grass cut, the shrubs trimmed and everything in the best condition. Then, the most important of all, STUDY COOKING. Make that a real study. Good cooking in the home will bring economy, more love and happiness in the homes. Besides, it will do away with much of the intemperance.

A MAN NEEDS A CERTAIN AMOUNT OF VEGETABLE ALCOHOL, AND IF HE DOES NOT GET IT IN DAINTILY PREPARED COOKING HE WILL TAKE THE PURE STUFF.

If you want to keep LIQUOR out of the home life, be a GOOD COOK. But, above all things, be a teetotaler. Teach the child to hate liquor in all forms. Teach him to live an upright and pure life and, above all, be a good Christian.

The Physician's Might.

CHELL, Labor Authority.

s been affected somewhat by the busimatter of course. But, on the whole, yment and irregular employment, the present labor conditions may be said to be pretty fair—that is to say, there are no serious strikes anywhere at the present time.

ORGANIZED LABOR HAS HELD ITS OWN THROUGH PRESSING TIMES.

There has been no loss of membership, and labor has suffered merely in the GENERAL HARDSHIP that has affected all industrial classes.

The significant fact of the labor situation throughout the panicky times, if they are to be called such, has been the fact that wherever labor has been well organized there has been NO REDUCTION IN WAGES, whereas among vocations where labor was not well organized there have been frequent reductions of wages. By this I do not mean that there have not been men out of employment and men laid off where labor was well organized, but the SCALE OF WAGES under such conditions HAS BEEN MAINTAINED.

SHORTAGE OF HORSES ALARMS THE ENGLISH

Unable to Mount One-Half of The Cavalry Service.

LONDON, March 24.—A very serious problem is arising in the Army with regard to the supply of horses for war. The falling off in breeding in this country has effected for many years the military service, but this disadvantage has been intensified by the increase of motor traction, which gives the War Office a reduced number of horses to draw upon. Firms and omnibus companies who formerly registered thousands for war service at a fee can only offer hundreds now. Steps have been taken to ascertain the numbers available in this country, and from all sources it is now quite apparent that if the first and second line armies were mobilized England should be faced with one of the most pressing of military difficulties in the supply of horses to keep them in the field. A rough census of the animals available in England, made with the assistance of the Board of Agriculture, masters of hounds, county authorities and the remount staff, shows that we have about 1,250,000 available horses of all kinds. Of these fewer than 200,000 are up to the cavalry standard. To place the expeditionary force of six regular divisions and one cavalry division in the field as a commencement, 70,000 horse would be necessary, and, in addition, 123,000 would be needed for the Territorial Force. At the present moment England has not in hand these 193,000 to commence a war with. The problem is more serious than that of men, as an army is immobile and passive without remounts. As replacement during the first year of a war 400,000 other horses would be necessary. In these numbers the question of a supply from abroad arises. No adequate arrangements have been announced for such a supply, and the foreign market in the next war, it is stated, will be closed against England. At the present moment the prices abroad are 20 per cent. higher than they were at the time of the Boer war. There will be a horse ring against the next nation which requires to drain the supply. That country can only be England, as the Continental nations have enriched themselves from English stock. It is reported that there are some thousands fewer brood mares now in the country and that the birth of foals has dropped by 10,000 a year. All this, added to the motor traction, is thinning the ranks of serviceable horses by many thousands annually, and the War Office is unable to get upon its registers anything approaching the numbers necessary for war purposes. The regular army at present has, excluding India, about 31,000 horses on charge. Fewer than half the number required before the army could take the field. About 18,000 are required for the artillery alone. Large numbers of the animals available are of poor quality, and the type is inferior to that selected for the Continental armies.

The extraordinary life history of a girl who was married at the age of fifteen, and who was referred to by consul as "the little widow" was related the other day in the Chancery Division, Dublin, in a case concerning a farm at Ballinaholy.

The girl is the daughter of the late Patrick William Mansfield, who purchased the land for $6,500. Mr. Mansfield died several years ago, leaving a widow and a number of children. The widow continued to manage the farm, but in 1897 she was in financial difficulties. In order, it is stated, to get someone to look after the farm, she married her fifteen year old daughter, Margaret, to an old farmer named Ahern, who settled down on the lands. A few months afterwards Mrs. Mansfield went to America and died there. Ahern died shortly after, leaving his girl wife with the other children of Mr. Mansfield, derelict on the farm. When "the little widow" had attained the age of 18 she married a young farmer named Michael Quinn. Mrs. Quinn is now a good-looking young woman of twenty-seven, the mother of several children.

A glimpse "behind the scenes" of the organization work necessary in preparing the great church pageant which is to take place in the grounds of Fulham Palace on June 10th was given yesterday by Mr. Frank Lanscelles, the master of ceremonies. "My company" he said, "will comprise about 5,000 amateur actors and actresses. The Oxford pageant was the largest held in this country before. At Quebec last year I had nearly 5,000 people. But this one will, I think, establish a world's record. Counting the members of the local committees and the 5,000 women who are making costumes, the number of people actively interested in the pageant is over 12,000. Mr. Mascelles describes how the 5,000 performers will be rehearsed. "In such a scene as that representing Augustine's arrival in Britain, leaders or groups will be chosen. Say there will be 500 or 600 actual performers. Fifteen of them will be group leaders heading parties of bishops, monks, courtiers and fishermen. It is these leaders that I shall first instruct, taking them to the ground, and showing them the movements of their parties, their entrances and exits. Then they will return to their districts and instruct their followers. By this system I shall not need more than five rehearsals of the whole army of performers, two for perfecting concert movements and three dress rehearsals. Mistakes at rehearsals I shall be able to correct by shouting through a giant megaphone. At the actual performance I shall be perched unseen by the audience, in a little box upon the top of the grand stand. At Quebec I controlled the entrances and exits of the hosts of players by means of forty-two telephones. In this case I shall probably need more, in a grand finale, which will take place after darkness has fallen, the whole of the 5,000 people will be massed together to sing the Te Deum, the scene be being illuminated by thirty powerful searchlights. This should be a memorable spectacle."

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MARCH 25, 1909.

DISFRANCHISEMENT THE VERY BEST AND THE VERY WORST REMEDY.

In a two page editorial appearing in the current number of Uncle Remus' Magazine, Joel Chandler Harris' monthly publication printed at Atlanta, Ga., which voices the sentiment of the entire South on matters appertaining to the welfare of the people of that section of the United States, the disfranchisement of the negro is discussed and the solution of the South's predicament as a result of the disfranchisement of the colored man is very plainly set forth. Conditions prevailing in Georgia at present will of a surety prevail in Maryland should the disfranchisement amendment be adopted and a word of warning now may be of inestimable benefit to the people of Maryland—Democrat and Republican.

The following extract from the magazine above referred to is reproduced herewith:

"The white Democratic primary—an evil, but until now, perhaps, a necessary evil—has literally squeezed the South dry of the sap of statesmanship, and there has sprung up a horde of shrewd, short-sighted politicians who would suffocate—two at the time—under the cloak of any one of those great men who when living were at home in the White House or formerly strode in the aisles of the Senate and House, head and shoulder above their fellows from other sections.

"The walls of the South's gallery of statesmen are today full to overflowing but her legislative halls are empty. Let us say that the golden blaze of an era of commerce necessarily dwarfs the intellectual renaissance, but also let us be fully frank and see the blight that the white democratic primary has put on our political buds and so prevented their full fruitage.

"In what manner does this primary show its power to rot the South's statesmanship and so rob her of her long held power and prestige? For example: In a primary for the Democratic nomination the race is between Democrats for selection by Democrats—and the result means an election. In nine cases out of ten there is no issue—no platform save democracy—and, as in the two recent gubernatorial primaries in Georgia, the result is an outpouring of personal abuse, vicious cartooning, and a flow of billingsgate that would make a fishwife faint from pure ecstacy; the physical deficiencies of an opponent are denounced from the platform with all the vigor of an attack on some venomous, man-eating trusts, and—

"Not one step forward is taken in the path of educating the people in issues that confronts them, in the problems and perplexities of our more-than-ever complicated machinery of government.

"Imagine the difference if Repubulicans and Democracts could begin to meet in the South in joint debate in a race for the governorship or for a seat in Congress. Tariff, trust curbing, national banking laws, postal savings bank, colonial problems, canal conditions, foreign relations, immigration, and a score more of interesting and vital questions would be exploited, and in the minds of many young men there would be implanted the seed of ambition and knowledge to develop true statesmanship; for the South has been the home of the statesmen as Virginia was once the mother of presidents.

"So the primary, benevolent in its outward aspects and first intentions, has driven the big vital issues out of the people's grasp and the platform is made the place for the airing of vulgar jocularity and personal spite, with a slim filler of patrotism a la flub-dub.

"This brings us to the disfranchisement of the negro, the very best and the very worse move that a Southern state could make.

"If on the one hand the South has been unfair to the negro in disfranchioement, on the other, in our method at least, we have been wantonly unjust to the illiterate white voter. Not many uneducated Southern whites—voters and soon-to-be-voters? See where Georgia or Alabama or South Carolina stands in percentage of illiteracy!

"The educational restriction put on the negro has proved to him a stimulus to acquire an education. And he is going to get it. Often he may not be able to reach to calculus and Greek, and just as often when he can he is obnoxious; but that is beside the question. He can and will learn of his three R's; and while the negro is fitting himself for suffrage, there, safely sheltered by the "grand-daddy" clause, is sitting the illiterate white voter whistling and whittling and forgetting that even grandfathers, though dead, soon become great-grandfathers, while the grandson becomes impossible as an ancestor.

"Logically' this means that within the next fifteen or twenty years the negro, armed with his ballot and carrying his educational credentials will inquire if his vote is ripe—and it will be. And the white illiterate white voter? He has doubled the South's burden—or rather by the disfranchisement of the negro, the illiterate white will have been made a double burden in his ignorance and lack of ambition; for the method has not only kept the white man at a standstill, but he can no longer count against a black vote.

"It is because this situation is being realized that the disfranchisement act may be termed the best and the worst thing for the South—for Georgia, as an instance.

"It means that we must soon begin to look to the Republican party—or the party in power as opposed to Democracy—to help solve our troubles when the negro vote arrives. And that is where it is good.

"It is in the present crippling of the negro vote in Georgia (and we use Georgia as representing the South) that the opportunity lies. The North understands—except in a few radical spots—that the negro can never step over a certain line in the South. But the North does not understand fully the essence of this feeling, this determination concerning the negro, which inheres not in prejudice, but in fact.

"President Roosevelt has begun to understand the situation in the South. He has opened the way for a Republican President to be put in close touch with Southerners and with their ideas and ideals.

"President-elect Taft has a wide and wonderful opportunity. The way in which he handles a doubly delicate situation will have a vital bearing on the making of history in the next ten or fifteen years."

MARYLAND DAY.

To-day, March 25, is the anniversary of the landing at St. Clements Island, now Blackstone's Island, St, Mary's county, of the first settlers in Maryland, in the year 1634.

It is altogether appropriate that there should have been set apart a particular day upon which Marylanders will take account of themselves and of the history of their beloved commonwealth. Maryland Day will be especially observed in the schools and this is appropriate and fitting. Every pupil who has arrived at the second reader stage of his educational progress should begin to learn something of the history of his state. In the schools Maryland Day will be history day, and, if only so much of the story of the Calverts shall be told this Thursday as will excite in the minds of the listener a rational curiosity to know more, the setting aside of the day will be amply justified.

But it is not the school alone that will turn a retrospective glance upon the past on the state day. Every patriotic son of the state should review the legends—get the history of his state a little more thoroughly soaked into him, so to speak. Up New England way they have acquired the habit of thinking the Colonial history of New England is practically the Colonial history of the country. Down Maryland way we have an abundance of reason for disagreeing with the New England theory.

And, every patriotic Marylander should, upon occasions, be prepared to state his reasons for regarding the history of his own commonwealth as equal in dignity and importance to that of any other of the original thirteen. There has been a great deal of commendable research work into early Maryland history during recent years, but there is yet much documentary material that ought to be put into readable form.

FIGHTING THE AMENDMENT.

We believe that the suffrage amendment can be beaten this fall but we also know that it is sheer folly to shut our eyes to the fact that the Republican party has a big fight on hand and one worthy of the best efforts, not alone of its leaders but the rank and file. But every army must have leaders, leaders who are alive to the needs of the hour and who can enthuse all the rest of us. Four years ago there were many Republican pessimists abroad in the State who, remembering the success of disfranchising legislation in the far South, felt that Maryland would follow suit, notwithstanding the bare-faced fraud of the Democratic ring in seizing upon this scheme for Maryland, when Maryland had no real danger of negro domination. These pessimists forgot that Marylanders have a way of doing their own thinking and that we have in this State more independent voting than in any State south of Mason and Dixon's line. Republicans, Independents and regular party Democrats worked shoulder to shoulder for its defeat and it went down by 30,000. But some of those who fought it then will not do so now. They belong to that class of voters who would gladly see the negro disfranchised but who knew enough of the machine to be afraid that under the Poe Amendment, harm might come to themselves. Governor Warfield knew from experiences with the ring that it was too dangerous to anti-ring Democrats to give so much power to election officials controlled by the ring. Senator Rayner didn't like it and so from within and without the Poe plan was attacked. The new amendment has been skillfully drawn to have as much "nigger" in it as possible with the features of the Poe plan objectionable to the party men eliminated. So that the fight this year will be along different lines. Governor Crothers will be for it where Governor Warfield was against it and Senator Rayner, candidate for re-election, will see merit in the Strauss Amendment without difficulty. A few of the independents were adroitly invited to assist in framing the new amendment but not all of those invited to give "first aid" remained. So then we see the battle cannot be so easily won. But the Republican forces are against it; a large number of independents are against it; and the great battle ground will be the class of voters in the Democratic party who love fair play and square deal; and those persons who were included before, (foreign born) but were left out this time, but who from experience are fearful that they might be included later on. There is work to be done by all those persons who are opposed to putting the ring shackles on Maryland. Tell your neighbor about it. Organize clubs. Talk it down and vote it down.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. Eugene G. Wilson, whose illness has been noted under this heading, died Sunday morning at 1.30 o'clock and was buried in the Oakland cemetery Tuesday afternoon after services in the M. E. church here, conducted by Rev. J. O. Bolton. A very large audience was present, including representatives from four orders of which deceased was a member.

The special services in the M. E. church which have been in progress for five weeks closed Sunday night, when one was taken into the church on probation and seven into full membership. Others had been admitted to membership during the progress of the meeting.

Mr. Emory Freeland, of near Albrightsville, W. Va., the new foreman of the grounds, will be here soon with his family and occupy the Association cottage near the lake.

Mr. Joe Callis has taken the place held by the late William Smouse.

Mrs. A. R. Sperry left for Baltimore Tuesday to visit her daughter and other relatives and friends.

Mr. Joseph Rathbun made a business trip to Rowlesburg, W. Va., Tuesday.

Mr. Adam Long, late foreman of the grounds, is now occupying the Saunders cottage on Deer Park drive.

Mr. Ed. Chance and family will move into the large Feather cottage on D street next week.

Mrs. Nihiser and son are occupying her cottage on I street.

Rev. Bolton make a flying trip to West Virginia Tuesday evening.

Mr. J. L. Echard has a force of men engaged in repairing the drive near the Mountain Lake hotel.

BITTINGER.

Grim old winter seems reluctant to release her grasp on material things, and while we have bright days with abundant sunshine, there is little of that delightful spring-time warmth we all enjoy and long for at this season.

John Green, of Dry Run, was a business caller here last Monday afternoon and brought with him the scalp of a large will cat, which he had caught near his home a few days before.

James Thomas, of Deer Park, was a pleasant caller in this village last Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Ellithorp spent last Sunday with relatives and friends in the vicinity of New Germany

Mahlon Brenneman, of McHenry, was visiting his old home at this place last Sunday.

Daniel Orendorf and his little son Max, of Mt. Lake Park, spent the early part of this week visiting relatives at this place.

Simon Orendorf, of Springs, Pa., spent last Saturday with his parents here.

Samuel Peck, of McHenry, was selling tar to his old friends and customers in this neighborhood last week.

Jacob Brenneman was in Oakland last week and while there qualified and received his commission as road supervisor for this district.

Cleveland Fazenbaker caught a fine large black otter in one of the local streams last week and received a handsome price for the fur.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower since our last report:

Laco Jacob Lansford and Emma Beulah Freeland, both of Clarksburg.

Virgil Porter Leggett and Myrtle Nina Colfield, both of Harrisville, W. Va.

Charles Adam Toothman and May Fluharty, both of Mannington, W. Va.

Daniel Dickey Snyder and Effie Monaset Evans, both of Jane Lew, W. Va.

Peter Kelley and Elsie Webb, both of Petroleum, W. Va.

Elmer Deal, of Somerset Pa., and Bertha Ellen Durst, of McHenry, Md.

Lawrence Francis Leonard and Rose Graham, both of Frostburg, Md.

MARYLAND'S OLD STATE HOUSE

One of the Most Interesting of American Landmarks.

In one of the magazines of recent date there is an interesting illustrated article upon the historic landmarks of America. There are pictures and descriptions of various monuments and buildings connected with our history. Among them we find pictures of Plymouth Rock, the Concord and Bunker Hill Monuments; of Independence Hall, of Mount Vernon, of Monticello and of Arlington. But the building which is perhaps, from an architectural and historic point of view, the most interesting in the United States is omitted. This is the old State House of Maryland. At the close of the Revolution this venerable building was described by the chaplain of the French Army, which had been stationed at Annapolis, as the finest building in America and of the most beautiful architecture. Events of greater importance occurred within its venerable walls than in any other American building. The Declaration of Independence was adopted in the Philadelphia hall, but when it was adopted the war had been in progress a year and it was merely a formal expression of what was, in fact, already determined upon by the progress of events. The war would have gone on and the Colonies would have become free and independent States, even if the formal declaration made to manifest a "decent respect for the opinions of mankind" had never been made.

The events which occurred in the Maryland State House were not merely formalies. They formulated events and directed the course of history. In the old Senate Chamber of the State House the Continental Congress held its sessions from the 26th of November, 1783, to the 3d of June, 1784. Shortly after ths Congress come to Annapolis the Treaty of Versailles, which had been signed on the 3d of September, arrived and was ratified in the old Senate Chamber. The treaty conceded the position of the United States as a free and independent nation and established its claim to all the territory between the Alleghenies and the Mississippi river. On the 23d day of December, 1783, following the ratification of the treaty, came General George Washington, the commander-in-chief, who had led the American Army to victory, who surrendered his commission and laid down his sword.

Then the scheme for a confederation of the States arose. Daniel Carroll, of Maryland, a member of the Continental Congress, offered a resolution, as follow: "The United States, in Congress assembled, should have the sole and exclusive right and to ascertion and fix the Western boundary of such States as claimed to the Mississippi any lay out the land so ascertained into separate and independent States from time to time as the number and circumstances of the people may require." The results of this resolution made the United States as it exists today possible. Maryland occupied a commanding position. Her territory was interposed between the Northern and Southern Colonies, and the confederation would be futile without the consent of Maryland. But Maryland refused absolutely to join the confederation until the States surrendered their claim to the Western lands This was finally done under what amount of compulsion from Maryland, and then, in the old State House at Annapolis, the Articles of Confederation were ratified and the separate States became the United States, with the public lands as common property, and out of these lands the great States of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin were erected. A few years after the ratification of the Articles of Confederation another and greater event occurred in the State House. On the 11th of September, 1786, the Annapolis convention assembled in the old Senate Chamber. This convention passed a resolution recommending that a convention of all the States be called for the purpose of rendering the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union. Out of this resolution, passed in the Maryland State House, came the Constitution of the United States and the Government as it exists today. The State House may therefore be considered, in a sense, the birthplace of the United States.

Through the initiative of Governor Warfield the State House Building Commission a few years ago restored the old Senate Chamber as it was when Congress received George Washington there in 1783. In a message to the Legislature January 3, 1906, Governor Warfield told of the restoratian, and said that the Senate Chamber would, in connection with the two adjoining rooms, be kept as a place in which will be assembled mementos associated with the War of the Revolution and the earlier days of the State. The first State House at Annapolis was burned to the ground in 1704. The second one was used for 68 years, when it was demolished to make way for the present building. The first appropriation for the building was made in 1769, and the building commission—Daniel Dulany, John Hall, Charles Carroll (barister), Thomas Johnson, William Paca, Launcelot Jacques and Charles Wallace—appointed. The architect was Joseph Clark. The foundation stone was laid by Governor Eden on March 28, 1772, and the building was completed the next year. In order to accommodate the offices of the Government, several unsightly additions were made from time to time. The Legislature in 1902, by a bill brought in by Senator Spencer C. Jones, decided to tear away these additions and replace them by one which would be sufficient for the needs of the Legislature. This was preferred to putting up a new building and leaving the old one unoccupied, as it was feared it might go to pieces. This was a fortunate decision, because in tearing away the old annexes the walls of the original building were found so insecure that unless they had been strengthened the whole edifice would have toppled over.

If this historic building were in New England, it would be used to attract visitors for commercial as well as historic purposes. Would it not be well for Maryland people to learn a lesson? Two electric railroads connect Annapolis with Baltimore, making it easy for visitors to that city to reach Annapolis, inspect the State House as well as the Naval Academy, besides such a number of Colonial residences and buildings as can be found in no other American city.

SUMMER NORMAL SCHOOL.

Avantages of Oakland Set Forth in a Letter Addressed to Teachers.

Mr. U. G. Palmer, principal of the Oakland Normal School, has addressed a circular letter to the teachers of the county in which he calls attention to the advantages of Oakland as an educational centre. In the school work Mr. Palmer will be assisted by Prof. A. W. DeWitt, who will have charge of English, and Miss Rebecca Thayer, who will instruct in the Latin classes.

The letter sent out by Mr. Palmer follows:

OAKLAND, MD., March 20, 1909.

You and your friends are cordially invited to become students in the Oakland Normal School which will open Monday, April 12, 1909. Tuition, $5.50 per term, which includes membership in the three weeks' session of Training School, June 8 to 25.

SOME OF OUR ADVANTAGES.

1. The largest and best equipped school building in the county.
2. A reference and general Library of 1200 volumes.
3. Excellent board and rooms at 50 cents per day.
4. An opportunity to attend the "Teachers' Round Table" of Western Maryland and West Virginia, which will be held here on Friday evening and Saturday, May 14 and 15, and which will be addressed by many strong educators.
5. An opportunity to attend the June session of our Circuit Court to see the actual workings of the judicial department of our government.
6. Through the kindness of one of our leading citizens the school will be equipped with a stereopticon for use in both class work and evening entertainments. We consider this a most valuable adjunct to school work as the eye is more effective avenue of information than the ear.
7. The last period each Friday the school will be addressed by some representative citizens on a timely educational subject.
8. Excellent stores and the best of church facilities.

A thorough review of all subjects taught in the Maryland Public Schools will be given and such new and advanced work will be added as students are prepared to take.

Miss Rebecca Thayer, who has made a specialty of the language, will have charge of the Latin.

We feel that we are better equipped to meet your educational needs this year than ever before and trust you will enroll the first day of the session and continue in attendance until the close of the State Teachers' Association at Mountain Lake Park July 2.

Yours truly,
U. G. PALMER, Principal.

P. S.—Students should bring any text books they may have.

Sheriff Austin Brown returned to Oakland Tuesday night from Baltimore having taken to that city the day previous three children named Gilpin who were committed to the Henry Watson Home by Justice West on information made by the father of the children who is an inmate of the county jail and a charge of the county. The conditions, moral and otherwise, surrounding the Gilpins prior to the action of their father, was something almost unbelievable in a Christian community. The mother lives in a shack on Water street.

LOST—Monday, March 15, on Hoop-pole road near the Brant farm, a fifteen-jewel Elgin movement watch; silverine open face case; attached was a Taft fob. Reward if returned to THE REPUBLICAN office.

Rev. Dr. R. B. Ward, district superintendent of the Oakland District, M. E. church, will go to Delaware, Ohio, some time during the latter part of April to attend a conference of the Bishops of his church and the district superintendents of the Ohio, Kentucky and West Virginia Conferences, which will be held in that city. In Ohio there are five conferences, while in Kentucky and West Virginia there are two and the number attending the conference will be quite large. At the meeting many matters of importance will be discussed. Dr. Ward will make an address dealing with present conditions of the church and outlining plans for greater scope of work and consequent better results.

UNIFORM RANK K. OF P. ORGANIZED

The Division Starts Off With Twenty-Four Well Officered Members.

Garrett Division Uniform Rank Knights of Pythias, was organized last Friday night by Col. Russler, of Cumberland, with a membership of twenty-four men, all being members of the local lodge Knights of Pythias.

The new division is virtually a rehabilitation of the original Lily Division of the organization which flourished among the members of Garrett Lodge a number of years ago, and was the pride of the organization at the time but owing to removals and a lack of interest in the rank it eventually ceased to exist.

The old rank was commanded by Dr. Henry W. McComas, was well drilled and for a long time was the only uniformed body in this section of the State.

The new division organized last Friday night is well officered, with R. C. Townshend, captain; Wade Hinebaugh, first lieutenant; D. E. Bolden, second lieutenant; Harper Bartlett, recorder.

As soon as possible uniforms will be secured from the manufacturers and upon their receipt the work of mastering the art of driling will begin.

DEATH RECORD.

EUGENE GARRETT WILSON.

Eugene Garrett Wilson, one of the most prominent residents of Mountain Lake Park, died at his home in that place Sunday morning, March 21st, 1909, after a prolonged and exceedingly painful illness extending over several months. The last three weeks of his life he suffered excrutiating agony, but with it all he forebore the pain with Christian fortitude. The deceased was born near Newburg, W. Va., October 8th, 1851, and was aged fifty-seven years, five months and thirteen days. On November 2nd, 1876, he was married to Miss Margaret Nine, also of near Newburg. To this union three children were born, namely, Charles Franklin, of Washington, D. C., and Rose Eugenia and Milton Curtis, of Mountain Lake Park, who reside there with their mother. Besides these Mr. Wilson is survived by his aged father, three brothers and six sisters. He joined the Methodist Episcopal church seven years ago but was never fully satisfied with his Christian life until the camp meeting at the Park two years ago, when he was happily converted. In addition to being a member of the church Mr. Wilson was a member of several organizations Having been made a Mason thirty-four years ago, at the time of his death he was an affiliated member of Oakland Lodge where he was held in high esteem and brotherly affection by the members of the Ancient Craft. Also a member of the Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows and Red Men, which organizations, along with the Masons, attended the funeral in a body, the funeral occuring Tuesday afternoon from the M. E. church at Mountain Lake Park where Rev. J. O. Bolton, the pastor, conducted a short service in the presence of a very large concourse of sympathetic relatives and friends, after which the body was conveyed to Oakland and interred in the cemetery here with Masonic ceremonies.

Rare Coins Found.

Some time ago while going over the premises of the late Katherine Kemble, Kingwood, W. Va., an old fashioned purse was found which contained many rare coins. Upwards of 100 silver 3-cent pieces were among the lot, all in a good state of preservation, the majority bearing the date of 1852. Quite a number of Spanish coins were in the purse, one piece bearing the date of 1773. At one time the Kemble property was a tavern, and the retail price of a drink of whiskey was 3 cents, which may account for the preponderance of that coin among the collection.

COPYRIGHT 1908, BY A. C. McCLURG & CO.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed huts to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.—Miss Leslie was attacked by a poisonous snake. Blake killed it and saved its poison to kill game.

CHAPTER XVIII.—For the second time Winthrope was attacked by fever. He and Blake disagreed.

CHAPTER XIX.—Blake made a strong door for the private compartment of Miss Leslie's cave-home. A terrible storm raged that night. Winthrope stole into her room, but she managed to swing her door closed in time.

CHAPTER XX.—Winthrope, badly hurt, died the following morning.

CHAPTER XXI.—The storm tore down their distress flag, so a new one was swung from the bamboo pole.

CHAPTER XXII.—Miss Leslie helped in covering Winthrope's grave with stones.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Genevieve took a strong liking to Blake.

CHAPTER XXIV.—On exploration tour they were attacked by a lion. Blake, by great exhibition of courage, repelled the beast. He then set fire to the woods. Miss Leslie told herself she had fallen in love with him.

The blood had flowed back into Blake's face, and showed on each cheek in a little red patch. His broad chest rose and fell slowly to deep respirations; his eyes glowed like balls of white-hot steel. He drew his bow a little tauter and wheeled slowly to keep the arrow pointed at the slight wave in the grass which marked the stealthy movements of the lion. Miss Leslie, more terrified with every added moment of suspense, cringed around, that she might keep him between her and the hidden beast.

Minute after minute dragged by. Only a man of Blake's obstinate, sullen temperament could have withstood the strain and kept cool. Even he found the impulse to leap up and run all but irresistible. Miss Leslie crouched behind him, no more able to run than a mouse with which a cat has been playing.

Once they caught a glimpse of the sinuous tawny form gliding among the leafless stems of a thorn clump. Blake took quick aim; but the outlines of the beast were indistinct and the range long. He hesitated, and the opportunity was lost.

Yard by yard they watched the slight swaying of the grass tops which betrayed the cautious advance of the grim stalker. The beast did not roar again. Having failed to flush his game, he was seeking to catch them off their guard, or perhaps was warily taking stock of the strange creatures, whose like he had never seen.

Now and then there was a pause, and the grass tops swayed only to the down-puffs of the heightening gale. At such moments the two grew rigid, watching and waiting in breathless suspense. They could see, as distinctly as though there had been no screening grass, the baleful eyes of the huge cat and the shaggy forebody as the beast stood still and glared out at them.

Then the sinuous wave would start on again around the grass border, and Blake would draw in a deep breath and mutter a word of encouragement to the girl: "Look, now—the dirty sneak! Trying to give us the creeps, is he? I'll creeps him! 'Fraid to show his pretty mug!"

Not until the beast had circled half around the glade did his purpose flash upon Blake. With the wariness of all savage hunters, the animal had marked out the spur of jungle on the north side, where he could creep closer to his quarry before leaping from cover.

"The damned sneak!" growled Blake. "You there, Jenny?"

She could not speak, but he heard her gasp.

"Brace up, little woman! Where's your grit? You're out of this deal, anyway. He'll choke to death swallowing me— But say; couldn't you manage to shin up a palm, 20 feet or so, and hang on for a couple of minutes?"

"I—can't move—I am—"

"Make a try! It'll give me a run for my money. I'll take the next elevator after you. That'll bring the bluffer out on the hot-foot. I slip a surprise between his ribs and we view the scenery while he's passing in his checks. Come; make a spurt! He's around the turn and getting nearer every step."

"I can't—Tom—there is no need that both of us— You climb up—"

He turned about as the meaning of her whisper dawned upon him. Her eyes were shining with the ecstasy of self-sacrifice. It was only the glance of an instant; then he was again facing the jungle.

"God! You think I'd do that!"

She made no reply. There was a pause. Blake—crouched on one knee, tense and alert—waited until the sinister wave was advancing into the point of the incurved jungle. Then he spoke, in a low, even tone: "Feel if my glass is there."

Her hand reached around and pressed against the fob pocket which he had sewn in the belt of his skin trousers.

"Right. Now slip my club up under my elbow—big end. Lick on the nose'll stop a dog or a bull. It's a chance."

She thrust the club under his right elbow and he gripped it against his side.

At that moment the lion bounded from cover with a roar like a clap of thunder. Blake sprang erect. The beast checked himself in the act of leaping, and crouched with his great paws outstretched, every hooked claw thrust out ready to tear and mangle. In two or three bounds he could have leaped upon Blake and crushed him with a single stroke of his paw. As he rose to repeat his deafening roar it seemed to Blake that he stood higher than a horse—that his mouth gaped wide as the end of a hogshead. And yet the beast stood hesitating, restrained by brute dread of the unknown. Never before had any animal that he had hunted reared up to meet his attack in this strange manner.

"Lie flat!" commanded Blake; "lie flat, and don't move! I'm going to call his bluff. Keep still till the poison gets in its work. I'll keep him busy long as I can. When it's over, hit out for home along the beach. Keep inside the barricade, and watch all you can from the cliffs. Might light a fire up there nights. There's sure to be a steamer before long—"

"Tom!" she cried, struggling to her knees—"Tom!"

But he did not pause or look around. He was beginning to circle slowly to the left across the open ground, in a spiral curve that would bring him to the edge of the jungle within 30 yards of the lion. There was red now showing in his eyes. His hair was bristling, no longer with fear, but with sheer brute fury; his lips were drawn back from the clenched teeth; his nostrils distended and quivering; his forehead wrinkled like that of an angry mastiff. His look was more ferocious than that of the snarling beast he faced. All the primeval in him was roused. He was become a man of the Cave Age. He went to meet death, his mind and body aflame with fierce lust to kill.

The lion stilled his roars and crouched as if to spring, snarling and grinning with rage and uncertainty. His eyes, unaccustomed to the glare of the mid-day sun, blinked incessantly, though he followed the man's every movement, his snarls deepening into growls at the slightest change of attitude.

In his blind animal rage Blake had forgotten that the purpose of his lateral advance was to place as great a distance as possible between him and the girl before the clash. Yet instinct kept him moving along his spiral course, on the chance that he might catch his foe off his guard.

Suddenly the lion half rose and stretched forward, sniffing. There was an uneasy whining note in his growls. Blake let the club slip from beneath his arm and drew his bow until the arrow-head lay upon his thumb. His outstretched arm was rigid as a bar of steel. So tense and alert were all his nerves that he knew he could drive home both arrows and still have time to swing his club before the beast was upon him.

A puff of wind struck against his back and swept on the nostrils of the lion, laden with the odor of man. The beast uttered a short, startled roar, and, whirling about, leaped away into the jungle so quickly that Blake's arrow flashed past a full yard behind.

"Tom!" She Cried, Struggling to Her Knees.—"Tom!"

The second arrow was on the string before the first had struck the ground. But the lion had vanished in the grass. With a yell, Blake dashed on across to the nearest point of the jungle. As he ran he drew the burning-glass from his fob and flipped it open ready for use. If the lion had turned behind the sheltering grass stems he was too cowardly to charge out again. Within a minute the jungle border was a wall of roaring flame.

The grass, long since dead, and bone-dry with the days of tropical sunshine since the cyclone, flared up before the wind like gunpowder. Even against the wind the fire ate its way along the ground with fearful rapidity, trailing behind it an upwhirling vortex of smoke and flame. No living creature could have burst through that belt of fire.

A wave of fierce heat sent Blake staggering back, scorched and blistered. There was no exultance in his bearing. For the moment all thought of the lion was swallowed up in awe of his own work. He stared at the hell of leaping, roaring flames from beneath his upraised arm. To the north sparks and lighted wisps of grass driven by the gale had already fired the jungle half way to the farther ridge.

Step by step Blake drew back. His heel struck against something soft. He looked down and saw Miss Leslie lying on the sand, white and still. She had fainted, overcome by fear or by the unendurable heat. The heat must have stupefied him as well. He stared at her, dull-eyed, wondering if she was dead. His brain cleared. He sprang over to where the flask lay beside the remnants of the lunch.

He was dashing the last drops of the tepid water in her face when she moaned and her eyelids began to flutter. He flung down the flask and fell to chafing her wrist.

"Tom!" she moaned.

"Yes, Miss Jenny, I'm here. It's all right," he answered.

"Have I had a sunstroke? Is that why it seems so— I can hardly breathe—"

"It's all right, I tell you. Only a little bonfire I touched off. Guess you must have fainted, but it's all right now."

"It was silly of me to faint. But when I saw that dreadful thing leap—" She faltered and lay shuddering. Fearful that she was about to swoon again Blake slapped her hand between his palms with stinging force.

"You're it!" he shouted. "The joke's on you! Kitty jumped just the other way, and he won't come back in a hurry with that fire to head him off. Jump up now and we'll do a jig on the strength of it."

She attempted a smile, and a trace of color showed in her cheeks. With an idea that action would further her recovery he drew her to a sitting position, stepped quickly behind, and, with his hands beneath her elbows, lifted her upright. But she was still too weak and giddy to stand alone. As he released his grip she swayed and would have fallen had he not caught her arm.

"Steady!" he admonished. "Brace up; you're all right."

"I'm—I'm just a little dizzy," she murmured, clinging to his shoulder. "It will pass in a minute. It's so silly, but I'm that way—Tom, I—I think you are the bravest man—"

"Yes, yes—but that's not the point. Leave go now, like a sensible girl. It's about time to hit the trail."

He drew himself free, and without a glance at her blushing face began to gather up their scattered outfit. His hat lay where he had weighted it down with the cocoanut. He tossed the nut into the skin bag and jammed the hat on his head, pulling the brim far down over his eyes. When he had fetched his club he walked back past the girl with his eyes averted.

"Come on," he muttered.

The scarlet in the girl's cheeks swept over her whole face in a burning wave, which ebbed slowly and left her colorless. Blake had started off without a backward glance. She gazed about with a bewildered look at the palms and the barren ridge and the fiery tidal wave of flame. Her gaze came back to Blake, and she followed him.

Within a short distance she found herself out of the sheltering lee of the ridge. The first wind gust almost overthrew her. She could never have walked against such a gale; but with the wind at her back she was buoyed up and borne along as though on wings. Her sole effort was to keep her foothold. Had it been their morning trip she could have cried out with joy and skipped along before the gusts like a schoolgirl. Now she walked as soberly as the wind would permit, and took care not to lessen the distance between herself and Blake.

Mile by mile they hastened back across the plain—on their right the blue sea of water, with its white-caps and spray; on their left the yellow sea of fire, with its dun fog of smoke.

Once only had Blake looked back to see if the girl was following. After that he swung along, with down-bent head, his gaze upon the ground. Even when he passed in under the grove and around the pool to the foot of the cleft he began the ascent without waiting to assist her up the break in the path. The girl came after, her lips firm, her eyes bright and expectant. She drew herself up the ledge as though she had been bred to mountain climbing.

Inside the barricade Blake was waiting to close the opening. She crept through and rose to catch him by the sleeve.

"Tom, look at me," she said. "Once I was most unjust to you in my thoughts. I wronged you. Now I must tell you that I think you are the bravest—the noblest man—"

"Get away!" he exclaimed, and he shook off her hand roughly. "Don't be a fool! You don't know what you're talking about."

"But I do, Tom. I believe that you are—"

"I'm a blackguard—do you hear?"

"No blackguard is brave. The way you faced that terrible beast—"

"Yes, blackguard—to've gone and shown to you that I—to've let you say a single word—Can't you see? Even if I'm not what you call a gentleman, I thought I knew how any man ought to treat a woman—but to go and let you know, before we'd got back among people!"

"But—but, Tom, why not, if we—"

"No!" he retorted, harshly. "I'm going now to pile up wood on the cliff for a beacon fire. In the morning I'll start making that catamaran—"

"No, you shall not— You shall not go off and leave me, and—and risk your life! I can't bear to think of it! Stay with me, Tom—dear! Even if a ship never came—"

He turned resolutely, so as not to see her blushing face.

"Come now, Miss Leslie," he said in a dry, even tone; "don't make it so awfully hard. Let's be sensible, and shake hands on it like two real comrades—"

She struck frantically at his outstretched hand.

"Keep away—I hate you!" she cried.

Before he could speak she was running up the cleft.

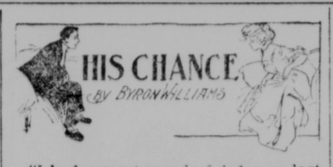
HIS CHANCE

BY BYRON A. WILLIAMS



"I had a most wonderful dream last night," said the man, looking at the woman with a longing in his eyes like a little child reaching its cherubic arms yearningly toward the evanescent moon.

"Rarebit or cigars?" asked the girl, as she leaned forward on the sofa, clasped her fine hands about her knee and waited.

"It was the afternoon before Saint Valentine's day," continued the man. "I was walking in a wood. The bleakness of the landscape had been beautified by a soft, sparkling snow, a blanket of prisms that glinted and glittered on the bed of Mother Earth."

"Horrid man," interrupted the maid, with a flash of mischief in her eyes, "to be prowling about a lady's boudoir that way!"

The man smiled.

"As I was saying, I was walking through the wood, when all at once I saw a drop of bright, red blood—"

"Blood is almost always bright red—"

"A drop of bright, red blood," continued the man, ignoring the sally, "right in my path. I hurried onward to the river's brim and there behind a screen of willows I came upon a combat so sanguinary that I halted as one transfixed."

"Murder!" cried the maid.

"Almost," said the man. "It was a game of cards between Cupid and the most beautiful woman in the world!"

"Indeed!" sniffed the woman, taking a cursory glance at her own beauty in a mirror opposite.

"Yes. At first they played for the sweetest kiss. Cupid lost. Then Love wagered his bow and arrows and quiver. He filled two typewriters and a pair of Johns with a blonde stenographer and—"

"What's that?" gasped the maid, bewildered.

"Er—I beg your pardon. He held two queens and two jacks and drew another queen."

"Oh!"

"The woman held four treys! Then Cupid lost his head. He put up his team of sparrows, his mother's doves, the ruby red of his lips, the dimples in his cheek and the silver of his laughter. The woman dealt the cards. Cupid had a little dog from the jump off—"

"He had a what?"

"A little dog—that is, any five cards from the deuce to the seven with one card out."

"I see."

"The woman bet against this the glory of her eyes, the coral of her ear, the silken luster of her hair, the willowy grace of her body and one love look!

"'I'm all in!' said Cupid, breathing hard.

"He was—"

"Oh, that means he didn't have anything more to bet."

"Oh!"

"'All right,' replied the woman, 'it's a show down!'

"A which?"

"A show down—that is, there would be no more betting. The one that held the best hand took the money—er, I mean, the things they had bet."

"I see. And what did the woman hold?"

"Oh, she didn't hold much—only a royal flush!"

"Wasn't that TOO bad! And she lost all those favors?"

"Lost nothing; she won!"

"Oh, does a royal flush beat a little dog?"

"Sometimes," said he, grinning.

"Is that all?"

"No," replied the man, striving to look into the eyes of the maid. "That isn't all. The woman was you!"

"Oh!" exclaimed the maid, blushing rosy red.

"And what chance do you think a fellow like me is going to stand against such a game as that?" persistently trying to catch her glance.

"Do you play cribbage, Mr. Brown?" asked the girl evasively.

"I prefer hearts," insinuatingly.

"Oh, er—Mr. Brown," queried the maid, "where did that drop of bright, red blood come from?"

"Hum, I never thought of that," pondered the man.

"Maybe Cupid had winged the woman before the game!" said the maid, hiding her eyes.

The man looked bewildered.

"Stupid!" said the maid. "Shall we play cards?"

WALKING SUIT A NECESSITY.

Garment That Gives Much Opportunity for Individuality.

For general wear, it is imperative that a woman should have a comfortable walking suit—one that clears the ground and is made as simply as possible, but still follows the lines of the prevailing fashion. Even for the woman of limited means there is just as much opportunity for individuality in dress as ever, and fashion seen through artistic individual taste is always in its best form.

The garment may be simple in extreme and yet be exceedingly smart if its cut is up-to-date. The long straight effects are seen in every sort of garment, and tend to make the wearer at least slender if not tall.

Good material should be selected in making up any kind of dress. The material which costs twice or three times as much as some cheaper stuff will often outwear the style of the garment and make over to good advantage. After a cleansing and pressing it is like new and never loses its distinction of good quality. A good quality, too, always speaks for itself, and means more for the success of garments made at home than the average woman realizes.

Broadcloth is more than ever to the fore this winter, as it suits exactly the requirements of the directoire mode. It has substance enough to make up for the absence of voluminous underskirts, and its delightful drapable quality takes the long lines and the fashionable figure to perfection.

It comes in every conceivable shade, and some of the tones are exquisite. However, for more common wear, such as the suits sketched on this page, worsteds, serge, cheviots and English cloths are more suitable, and perhaps stand rough everyday wear better.

The whole costume should carry out one color scheme, with perhaps a touch of some other color or a bit of gold, which is so very popular this season, may be introduced.

MAUVE SILK EVENING DRESS.

With Something New in the Way of Ornamentation.

Finely checked mauve silk is used for this design. The skirt is high-waisted, and has a strip of insertion taken down each side of front, and continued round the hem; the material continues three-quarters of the way down in the front, it is slightly rounded; two deep lace frills fill in the other part of front of skirt.

The bodice has a tucker of lace and the insertion put on in a deep round, a crossing of insertion, and a piece of lace round the arm-hole, forms the sleeve; a lace medallion is sewn on the top of each sleeve.

Materials required: Fourteen yards silk 22 inches wide, 4 yards lace, 9½ yards insertion, 2 medallions, 1½ yards insertion for sleeves.

That Blurred Look.

One housekeeper has discovered how to rid herself of that blurred bluish look that does so much to ruin the appearance of fine mahogany. In a long spell of damp weather this blur will come even with the utmost care and polishing.

To get rid of it the housewife mixed about four tablespoonfuls of household ammonia into half a pailful of tepid water. With a soft clean sponge not too wet she washed off the blurred surface of the wood, then wiped it dry and polished with a clean piece of chamois.

The woman who is afrid to use water on mahogany will be surprised to learn that it was a favorite method of our grandparents whose fine old furniture has come down to us in such good condition. Care must be taken that no water is allowed to remain on the wood and that it is rubbed to a high polish.

Children's New Frocks.

The high-waisted, one-piece [illegible] are here for children. They look quaint and charming in them, an especially pretty style for wear at their evening parties, made of messaline, soft cashmere, chine silk, or silk mull.

The skirt has the same lines used on grown-ups. It runs to the bust and is almost straight over the waist. It fastens down the back under a box plait, and the top part is made from good lace, fine embroidery, and sometimes a little gold and silver thread.

Young girls wear this kind of gown in rose pink, old blue, Nile green and faint lavender.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

Hunting the Lion

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

THE African lion is the greatest hunting prize on earth. British army officers may discourse on the thrills of tiger shooting in the Bengal jungle, and other men may descant on the elephant shooting found in the Kongo Free State, but the slayer of a full grown lion in all the majesty of his ferocious power is the envy of them all, secret though it may be. It is acknowledged by big game trackers that no man can become a king of hunters until he has pursued and slain the king of beasts in his own domain.

In choosing the Uganda plateau as his principal hunting field Mr. Roosevelt hit on one of the most dangerous lion haunts known, for this section of British East Africa has thus far escaped the devastating operations of insatiable Nimrods who have practically depleted of big game much of the South African region and a large part of the Kongo and British Sudan. Lions are also plentiful east of Uganda, on the Athi plains, along the Athi river and in the great Rift valley, British East Africa, which general section the Roosevelt party contemplates visiting en route to Uganda.

COPYRIGHT, BY UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD N.Y. (STEREOGRAPH)

THE MONARCH OF EAST AFRICA.

As many as 3,000 natives a year have been killed by the lions and lionesses of Uganda and its neighboring regions, and the number of whites thus lost—laborers, railroad employees, officials, residents, soldiers and hunters—is by no means inconsiderable. The grim death roll of the jungle beasts is no respecter of persons.

All the askaris (trained native hunters of the safari, or expedition) are usually called into active service in lion stalking or lion driving, for the speed, strength, resisting powers, ferocity and resourcefulness of the jungle monarch render necessary all the opposition that can be mustered.

In a river or lake region, of which there are many in Uganda, it is customary to seek the lion along the water's edge early in the morning, where he attacks the various kinds of antelopes when they come down to drink. The curious spectacle is here often presented of a large herd of wildebeests (a species of gnu) being led to water by a graceful, shapely hartbeest. The wildebeest is an inferior animal and knows it and regularly secures the fleeter, sharper eared and eyed hartbeest to guide herds to the water at sunrise and sunset. The wildebeests assemble at a certain spot on the plain, and at the proper time the pilot steps off in the lead, as proud and as conscious as a much epauleted colonel on dress parade.

If lions are not discovered in the reed and flag beds (tinga-tinga) along the river, and there is reasonable certainty that they are in the immediate vicinity, a drive is organized in the following manner: The askaris and such other natives as have been brought along, equipped with their native musical instruments—drums and tomtoms, supplemented by biscuit tins and sticks, gourds filled with stones, etc.—spread out in a long line, say half or three-quarters of a mile distant. Now, making all the noise possible, they advance toward the water, beating the bushes. The white hunters, or "guns," and their gun carriers have been stationed in open patches toward which the drive is aimed. Crouching at separated points in the brush, they anxiously await the approach of the desired game, for lions and other animals are afraid of the noise and retreat before it, thus being forced close to the marksmen. Great danger here arises for the hunters not only from the lions, but from the cross fire of the different guns aimed at plunging animals from different angles. Stray bullets from a 35 autoloader or a 40 Express rifle are not pleasant visitors.

Quickest thought and action and surest aim are here required as a lion comes headlong through the thicket. Usually more than one well directed shot must be fired before a lion drops. Frequently the beast advances on a hunter after four or five balls have struck him in seemingly vital spots. Raging from pain, he springs upon his enemy and in convulsive death struggles kills him if the native gun bearer has not the courage and skill to stand by and dispose of the beast without injuring the struggling hunter. When a lion is shot and lies as dead the natives never allow any one to approach the body until they have thrown sticks and stones at it repeatedly without response, for the treacherous beasts have a habit of "playing possum," pretending to be dead and springing fiercely on those who draw near.

Mr. Abel Chapman, noted African hunter and explorer, in his latest book, "On Safari," describes an exciting Uganda lion drive and its results in part as follows:

"I was on the left of the line of 'guns,' facing the lake. I was lying hidden in long grass about 100 yards from the covert, and the noisy line of beaters had already approached within half a mile when my Somali gun bearer, Elmi Hassan, who was lying beside me, pointed into the woods, saying: 'See! Two lions! You no see?' I certainly did not see. They were not easy to detect, so low and stealthy was their advance. As the lions were completely inclosed, I would not risk the uncertain shot they now offered. At a point exactly on my front the two beasts lay down in two green bushes that grew within a dozen yards of each other beneath the last straggling trees.

"Hardly had this incident occurred than we became aware, by a chorus of discordant yells from the beaters, some of whom we could see rushing out of the woods, that they had come across something inside that was not quite to their taste. The word 'simba' (lion) predominated, and at once the three 'guns' on my right, including my brother, dashed toward the point indicated. Having two lions in front of me, I remained quietly where I was, beckoned to my left hand neighbor, told him what I had seen and arranged that he should advance from the left while I went straight in to the lions in front.

"At twenty yards distance it seemed impossible that so large a beast as a lion could still be lying in so small a bush without my seeing it. They must, I thought, have slipped away unobserved, and I was walking on, almost carelessly, until within ten yards of the right hand bush, when Elmi suddenly seized my arm, pointing the rifle he carried into the base of the bush and hissed: 'See! See! The lion! Shoot him! Spring!'

"Once more I must admit that I could see nothing. Strain my eyes as I would, I could distinguish nothing like a lion in that bush. I decided rather recklessly, and perhaps from some sense of shame that a black man should be so superior in eyesight, to fire. There was no mistaking the response—a growl more savage than I ever had heard in my life before. I also saw through the thick smoke the electric convulsion with which the beast pulled itself together for a spring. The movement disclosed the position of the head and shoulder, and I put the second bullet well in behind the shoulder. The beast, still growling, but mortally sick, crawled out beyond. I now saw it was a lioness. Elmi handed me the 45, and a third bullet, raking forward from the stern, stretched her among the grass.

"While rushing forward to examine the beast and in the excitement of the moment utterly forgetting the second lion in the other bush, now behind us, I was promptly reminded by shouts and two rapidly fired shots in that direction. Turning round, I was just in time to see this beast, also a lioness, bound out toward me, a yellow streak, from the thick covert, growling and snarling. I remember seeing her white teeth as she commenced another growl—she was only twenty yards away—but that movement was her last. A Paradox ball on the shoulder dropped her from our sight.

"While Elmi and I were thus occupied we had heard several rifle shots away on our right. It now transpired that a third lioness had also been secured by the 'guns' who had gone off in that direction. All three lionesses were dragged out of the covert by our boys and laid in a row on the grass outside, where a scene of indescribable excitement ensued, the niggers dancing and jumping around the dead beasts to an accompaniment of shrieks, beating of tomtoms and other fearsome instruments, including biscuit tins."

In the open the hunter continually uses his powerful fieldglasses in seeking game, and at times he discovers a lion that may be approached by means of bush stalking—that is, by warily stealing close enough to him to secure a shot. But to insure success the animal must not be disturbed, and annoying difficulties arise. The shifting winds and numerous small fowl and animals that start up noisily from underfoot serve to warn the intended prey. By getting so that the wind blows from the lion toward the hunter, or nearly so, the animal does not detect the hunter's scent, but the variable African breezes frequently put the hunter to windward, and the lion quickly discovers his enemy's presence. Bush stalking is usually employed in antelope hunting.

Deep ravines are a favorite shelter of lions during the rainy seasons. Outlying rock koppies around the mountains of Uganda are during these seasons also popular retreats. The lions lie outside their caves by day on shelves of rock and have two outside beds, so that when the overpowering midday sun makes one bed too hot they change to the other, so chosen as to be more shaded at that period. In the dry season they find enough shelter in the grass and reed beds or among the heavy canes. When the lions are out of their rocky diurnal lairs and in the open veldt pursuit of them is greatly assisted by having capable mounts on hand—mounts the tsetse fly has overlooked. Lions, finding that they cannot catch or escape from horsemen in the open, will crouch, awaiting attack, and thus afford a target.

Veteran hunters have learned to watch other animals during lion hunts for indications of the latter's presence. For instance, if a herd of grazing antelopes is divided, the divisions feeding on both sides of an open stretch of favorable ground, they often find that the open space is a zone through which a lion's scent is blowing, denoting the beast's close presence to windward. Mounted Somali warriors are often used to scout the rolling country for lion tracks.

East African lions show a marked animosity to mounted men, arising probably from the advantage given by the horse's speed. They will attack mounted men when unmolested and when the circumstances would warrant their avoiding unmounted men until attacked. Recently a few miles north of Lake Isch, which Mr. Roosevelt will pass, a lion sprang from a clump of bushes upon a mounted English army officer and a companion, threw the officer and his pony to the ground, breaking the pony's back, and then killed the other man, tearing away his face. The Englishman killed the lion with two hollow pointed lead slugs from a 40 Express.

Hunters often trace lions by means of the musky odor of places where the beasts have stayed for a period, but sometimes they are aggravatingly deceived by an aromatic shrub that fills the air with an odor practically indistinguishable from lion scent.

As a lion when unable to finish its prey at one meal often returns to it the following day, this habit is sometimes taken advantage of when a freshly killed animal bearing a lion's marks is discovered. A trap gun is set, arranged by attaching a piece of string to the trigger of an ordinary rifle in such a way that the lion in attempting to reach its anticipated meal strikes the connection, causing the rifle to go off. The gun is arranged so that the lion will invariably receive its contents. While the trap gun rarely kills the game, it gives notice to the hunters and wounds the beast.

As many as 3,000 natives a year have been killed by the lions and lionesses of Uganda and its neighboring regions, and the number of whites thus lost—laborers, railroad employees, officials, residents, soldiers and hunters—is by no means inconsiderable. The grim death roll of the jungle beasts is no respecter of persons.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

The money and talent in any civilized city is sufficient if properly used and distributed to make that city an Eden, an Hesperides garden or the realization of any dream, ancient or modern, of the Golden Age. All would be educated, all would partake of the best things; there would be no slums, no abject poverty. Everyone could have all the joy, the wealth, the comforts, the rights, the school privileges which he could use. The one thing needed is the improved man to make the social transformation of the world, the eliminating every evil from the character of men, till they are restored to the moral image of God, when each one did all he wished, and wishes but what he ought.

The great obstacle in the way is sin, bad character in some of its many forms.

The one of these forms, the great obstacle which most concerns us in this lesson, is intemperance, the want of self-control over the appetites and passions.

The wise man of the Proverbs expresses the evils of intemperance by a series of questions.

29. "Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow?" The words corresponding to the two substantives are, strictly speaking, interjections, as in the margin, Who hath oh? Who hath alas? The woes are too great and too many to name separately. They are woes of body and woes of mind; woes in one's self, woes in his family; pains, diseases, poverty.

Note that other people have woes and sorrows, besides the intemperate man. Apostles and martyrs have been imprisoned and tortured, have suffered hunger and thirst, endured poverty and sickness and pain. We have studied some instances during the past quarter. Read the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. Read the stories of the Huguenots in France, and of the martyrs and missionaries of every age.

But the difference in the two kinds of suffering is heaven-wide.

The woes and sorrows of Peter and John, Paul and Silas, in dungeons and chains, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake, with clear consciences, for the sake of the kingdom of God and salvation of men, listening to God's "Well done, good and faithful," and seeing the crown of righteousness are almost infinitely removed from the woes and sorrows of those "that tarry long at the wine," whose sufferings are the fruit of their own sins.

The other sorrows that flow from the wine cup mentioned in the wise man's questions belong only to wickedness—a quarrelsome disposition—where strong drink inflames the passions, and, at the same time, removes the restraint of conscience and will, first maddening and then unchaining the tiger, grumbling, foolish talking—where the drunkard's "tongue is set on fire of hell;" "wounds without cause;" "redness of eyes;" either (or both) the dimming of the sight, physical, mental and spiritual, or the "copper nose" which makes "the drinker's nose blush for the sins of his mouth."

The means by which these great evils can be removed are precisely the same as those which produced the marvelous transformations of character in the early Christian disciples, which we have been studying.

1. Christ, our Living Leader, the power of God for salvation.

2. The Holy Spirit, convincing men of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment to come; awakening men's hearts, inspiring them to better things.

3. The religious life which these produce.

4. The results as manifested in the healing of the body, and the betterment of the outward life and happiness, which were symbols and means to a better spiritual life.

5. The banding together in an organization which created a helpful moral atmosphere.

6. The courage, wisdom, generosity, love, peace, joy, religious spirit, righteousness of life, produced in the disciples.

7. Their efforts to bring others into these blessings, and to spread the good news.

8. The good example of the Christians.

Practical Points.

The economic value of the virtues. The splendid dream of co-operation can only become possible when there is (1) widely diffused intelligence, and (2) a widely diffused virtue. A new race of men will make a new world.

D. A. McDermid, secretary of the London Temperance league, London, Ontario, says: "I have been identified with work among boys for many years, in night schools, Bands of Hope, and Sunday school, and I never knew a good boy who smoked cigarettes, and with rare exceptions a bad boy who did not."

In War and Commerce the Aeroplane Will Be a Factor.

By Col. JOHN JACOB ASTOR of New York.

I DON'T see that the balloon can ever become commercially practical, but it is a different story with the aeroplane.

IT IS BOUND TO BE USEFUL FOR CARRYING PASSENGERS AND IN WAR.

The balloon must sail with the wind. The aeroplane even now can buffet quite a strong breeze. There is no reason to assume that it cannot be IMPROVED VASTLY and in time be able to negotiate any ordinary current of air. Then it will become most useful for carrying passengers and especially so in war. Men who fight must necessarily take some risk.

WHAT A REMARKABLE AID A WORKING AEROPLANE WOULD BE TO AN ARMY WHICH NEEDED A MEANS OF RECONNOITERING OR WANTED TO OBSERVE THE POSITION OF THE ENEMY.

And added to this is the facility for flying over the enemy and dropping explosives into his camp. It is almost impossible for rifle bullets to reach such a machine, and modern field guns could not be trained high enough to hit one. The ONLY CHANCE would be for an expert rifleman to hit the man at the motor. A bullet through the canvas planes would not harm the machine in the slightest. And what chance has a rifleman to hit a machine going forty miles an hour through the air 1,000 feet or more above the surface of the earth?

Every American must feel proud of the work of the Wrights on both sides of the Atlantic. They have carried off all records here and all records abroad. They have solved the problem of aerial flight without any doubt. Their machines are rightly designed, and it seem only necessary to perfect them to make them practicable and of commercial use.

The Power of Capital Is Now Pre-eminent.

By WOODROW WILSON, President of Princeton University.

THE most striking fact about the actual organization of modern society is that the most conspicuous, the most readily wielded and the most formidable power is not the power of government, but the power of capital.

MEN OF OUR DAY IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA HAVE ALMOST FORGOTTEN WHAT IT IS TO FEAR THE GOVERNMENT. BUT HAVE FOUND OUT WHAT IT IS TO FEAR THE POWER OF CAPITAL, TO WATCH IT WITH JEALOUSY AND SUSPICION AND TRACE TO IT THE SOURCE OF EVERY OPEN OR HIDDEN WRONG.

Our memories are not of history, but of what our own lives and experiences and the lives and experiences of the men about us have disclosed. We have had no experience in our day or in the days of which our fathers have told us of the TYRANNY OF GOVERNMENTS, of their minute control and arrogant interference and arbitrary regulation of our business and of our daily life, though it may be that we shall know something of it in the NEAR FUTURE. We have forgotten what the power of government means and have found out what the power of capital means, and so we do not fear government and are not jealous of political power. We fear capital and are jealous of its domination.

Capital now looks to the people like a force and interest APART, with which they must deal as with a MASTER and not as with a friend.

Man's Ethical Ideas Count, Not His Dogmas.

By Dr. FRIDTJOF NANSEN, Explorer and Diplomat.

IT is for the state to demand that, whatever his religious views may be, every citizen should be given good, sound ethical ideas fit to make him a useful and skillful member of the community. And they should be given him in such a way that they will LAST HIM FOR LIFE, not to be shaken by whatever doubts his religious faith may have to encounter.

The search of truth should be not only a pleasure; it has to be sincere. It is essential that young people should learn from the beginning that SINCERITY is the one virtue which is at the basis of all ethics.

Another virtue of fundamental importance is modesty.

Let the desire be to do everything as well as possible and the satisfaction to feel that we have done so. But also let it be impressed upon the young men never, when there is a choice, to do anything which can be done EQUALLY WELL OR BETTER by some one else.

Finally, it should be remembered always that it is not the views that a man holds or the dogmas he believes in that are of importance for his fellow creatures. It is his ACTS. Even the loftiest dreams above the clouds are of little avail if they do not lead to action.

While the religious dogmas of every age have been continually changing with the growth of human thought, ethical ideas early reached a comparatively high level, and certain leading principles have changed comparatively little. I give as examples the ethical ideas of the Greek religion, of Buddhism and of Christianity.

IT IS EVIDENT THAT FOR THE COMMUNITY AND THE STATE THE ETHICAL IDEAS OF THE CITIZENS ARE OF THE GREATEST IMPORTANCE, WHILE A MAN'S RELIGIOUS DOGMAS SHOULD BE ENTIRELY HIS PRIVATE CONCERN.

TO LIMIT AMOUNT OF GAME KILLED

Commission Sub-Committee Makes Important Recommendation at Meeting.

The Game and Fish Commission appointed by Governor Crothers to consider all the laws bearing on the subject of game and fish for the purpose of systematizing and generalizing them for the whole State as far as possible met in the Union Trust Building, Baltimore. George Dobbin Penniman presided, in the absence of Chairman Milbourne, whose train did not take him to Baltimore until the afternoon, and the upland game committee, one of the subcommittee of the Commission, took up the questions on which it was asked to report.

It was decided to recommend to the Legislature a limitation on game that can be killed in any one day to 15 partridges, 6 pheasants, 12 rabbits, 10 squirrels, 12 woodcock, two wild turkeys, 15 doves, 5 plovers, 100 rail or reed birds and 15 snipe.

The State is to be divided into game districts, with Garrett, Allegany and Washington counties as one, the Southern Maryland counties as another, the Eastern Shore as a third and the counties in Central Maryland as a fourth. In each of these counties the season for killing is to be designated, and the Commissioners can if they see fit curtail the season specified in the proposed law.

Gunners are to be licensed, $5 being the fee for non-residents and $1 for resident, but any man is at liberty to gun on his own farm without taking out a license. The money derived from the fund is to be used by the Game Warden in upholding the law and propagating game. In case a gunner fails to secure a license, a fine of $25 is to be imposed.

In the proposed law is a provision that the informer is to receive the fine imposed in cases of violations of the law, the money to be paid directly to him by the magistrate imposing the penalty.

Guy Steele, the former State's Attorney of Carroll, suggested that this be changed so that the fee would be paid on a warrant by the County Commissioners. Indirection would, he thought, result in more information of violations, especially if steps were taken to prevent the name of the informer from becoming public property. This he thought, could be done. Mr. Steele was asked to prepare a clause for the proposed law along the lines suggested for the consideration of the committee.

Commander Howard of the Oyster Navy was asked to serve as chairman of the fish committee, but he declined, saying that his work was keeping him so busy that he did not have the time to look after the subject.

Before the report of the upland Commission it must be approved at a general meeting. Every clause in the proposed law will have to run a gauntlet of criticism.

It is the desire of the Commission to have the next Legislature authorize the appointment of a Commission on Game and Fish for the whole State.

Preston B. Springs of Talbot county, had several suggestions to make to the Committee considering fish legislation. He has gone carefully into the situation, consulting with people who are familar with the subject. He will ask, among other things, for prohibition of shipments of certain kinds of fish and game from the State, including terrapin more than seven inches long.

Disillusioned Widows.

A writer in a Washington paper thinks that widows make the best wives and presents an interesting array of historical widows showing that the weed-wearing state is conducive to soul development that makes for the managing of other husbands than the one for whom she mourns. She knows that a man is a contradiction before she begins and there is no danger of her losing her illusions.

Case Argued in Cumberlnd.

Before Judge Boyd in Cumberland last Saturday the case of John T. Mitchell, of Oakland, vs. Eli Stanton and others, of Grantsville, was argued upon an agreed statement of facts by Messrs. F. A. Thayer and E. H. Sincell for the plaintiff and Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord for the defendants. The suit is one concerning a certain tract of land located near Grantsville to which both parties lay claim. Judge Boyd will render his decision later.

Glut in Maple Sugar.

An open winter has caused a record run of maple sugar sap in the mountains of Fayette and Somerset counties, Pa. The flow began early in February, and shows no signs of abatement. Many farmers are having trouble in disposing of their product. Sugar is selling at 6 cents a pound and syrup at 65 cents a gallon. The usual price of maple sugar is 10 cents a pound, while the syrup rarely sells for less than $1 a gallon.

GOOD ROADS MEEETING AT THE PARK NEXT JULY

President Taft Has Been Invited to Attend.

Plans have been made for one of the greatest good roads meetings in the history of the country at Mountain Lake Park next July. The exact date for the beginning of the conference will be fixed at an early date. The governors of Maryland and West Virginia are taking a personal interest in the meeting and both have accepted invitations to attend. President Taft has been invited to attend the meeting, and it is believed he will make it a point to be present one day at least. Delegates will attend from West Virginia, Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio and other states. It is probable that the conference will extend through an entire week, and many prominent good roads men, statesmen, capitalists, and engineers will take part.

Col. J. M. Burns, of Morgantown, is greatly interested in the plans for the meeting. He is the author of an article in the current number of the West Virginia Magazine on good roads and road building. The writer has covered the subject in a most logical, comprehensive and convincing manner, and the paper will take its place among the best writings on the subject.

LAKE FORD.

We have plenty of snow and mud at this writing.

The farmers of this section are busily engaged putting up lime kilns.

Mr. Walter Boyer, who has been confined to his bed for four months with blood poison, is no better at this time.

We are sorry to note the death of Guy Spahr, who died after a short illness of pneumonia. Mr. Spahr was an ideal young man and one who will be greatly missed in our community. We sorry to lose him but we submit to will of Him who doeth all things well. His influence will linger in the hirds of all who knew him for years to come. His funeral was held at the Lake Ford church on March 23. The services were conducted by Rev. J. W. Bone, of the Presbyterian church of Terra Alta, of which Mr. Spahr was a member. His remains were laid to rest in the Lake Ford cemetery, attended by a large gathering of sorrowing relatives and friends.

MARYLAND DAY IN THE SCHOOLS

An Interesting Program Rendered Last Thursday.

The public schools celebrated March 25—Maryland Day—with appropriate exercises, rendering the following program:

Song, "America," school; reading, Eleanor Hinebaugh; What Maryland Day Means, Grant Palmer; First Proprietary Colony, Dwight Townshend; First Decision on Stamp Act, Irma Workman; Nucleus of the Provincial Government, Mark White; The New Constitution, Paul Workman; Maryland's Four Hundred, Mary West; Washington Resigning His Commission, Mary West; song, "Maryland, My Maryland," school.

The event of the day was an address by Hon. Mr. Purnell of the State Board of Education. Mr. Purnell spoke for an hour on the early history of the colony, considering two topics, "Religious Toleration" and "The Part Maryland Played in the Founding of Our National Government." He showed from unquestioned authorities that it was the idea of religious toleration—the corner stone of the first Maryland colony—that resulted in our representatives in the Constitutional Convention having engrafted in the Federal Constitution the privileges of every citizen to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

The Articles of Confederation was the forerunner of the Federal Constitution and their adoption for months hung upon the question of the public lands. Massachusetts, Virginia and others having charters calling for territory to the Mississippi river while Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey had no territory beyond the present limits. Maryland refused to sign until the States would all cede these public lands to the nation and provide for their erection into states as soon as their population warranted. The contention of Maryland prevailed.

Mr. Purnell's address was a careful research into the details of early Maryland history—tracing effects to causes and showing also the effects of causes.

Every citizens of Oakland should have heard this address and its publication would be a valuable addition to our historical literature.

After a few appropriate remarks by County Superintendent Browning the school sang "The Flag of the Free" and adjourned.

OAKLAND HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATING EXERCISES

Program To Be Rendered Friday Night In the Opera House.

Friday night of this week the commencement exercises of the Oakland High School will be held in the Oakland Opera House, when the graduating class will be presented with their diplomas and a program of interest will be rendered.

The members of the class have mailed a large number of invitations to their friends and the prospects are that the Opera House will be well filled.

The members of the graduating class are Miss Orpha Ashby, Mark Sherman White and Dean Cook Skinner, all of Oakland and most excellent young people. Miss Ashby will read an essay entitled "The Power of Purpose," and will also render a vocal solo. She has a well modulated voice and her ability as a singer is recognized by excellent judges. The male members of the class will also read essays.

Musical numbers will also be rendered by a quartet and Dr. Robinson will play a violin solo.

The feature of the evening's entertainment, however, will be an address by Hon. Philip Willett, late of London, England, but at present a resident of Mountain Lake Park. Mr. Willett's addresses in all parts of the country have been well received and he has been the recipient of many flattering press notices.

The program for the evening is appended below:

PART I.

Overture	Orchestra.
Quartet	Dr. Robinson, Mr. Naylor, Misses Litman.
Essay	"The Panama Canal." Dean C. Skinner.
Vocal Solo	Miss Orpha C. Ashby.
Essay	"Knowledge is Power." Mark S. White.
Violin Solo	Herman Runter.
Essay	"The Power of Purpose. Miss Orpha C. Ashby.
Selection	Orchestra.

PART II.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mrs. J. W. Feather, a former resident and a cottage owner here, was in the Park over Sunday, on her return from a visit to her daughter Mrs. Coral Whetsell at Southern Pines, N. C. Mr. Whetsell has not improved much in health, but is able to do light work connected with his business—photography.

Mr. and Mrs. Milton Echard and son Charles returned to their cottage here Tuesday after spending the winter in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Freeland, the new foreman of the grounds, together with his family and household goods, arrived on Tuesday and are now occupying the cottage at the lake.

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Williams and two daughters are occupying their cottage on G street.

Messrs. Cuppett, Leighton & Co last week packed about sixty tons of snow around and over their refrigerator room in their ice house.

A car of lime was unloaded here this week by Cuppett, Leighton & Co. and J. L. Echard.

Maj. J. M. Burns was here last week arranging for improvements at his farm near here.

Messrs. J. R. Kerfoot and G. C. Hammond, who have been confined to their homes most of the winter by sickness, are able to be out.

Mrs Hannah Bowman, the oldest resident of the Park, who has been very ill at the residence of her daughter Mrs. Virginia Pierce, is now much improved.

Mrs. S. O. Sawyer, proprietor of the Assembly House, is here putting her popular house in order for the summer season.

The Invincibles, the large male class in the M. E. Sunday School, will be entertained at the parsonage Friday evening. Mr. E. E. Friend's class of young ladies will also be present.

Public Sale.

A public sale of live stock, farming implements and household goods will take place at Fred Gortner's, at his residence at Gortner, about five miles south of Oakland, on Tuesday, April 6th, beginning at 12.30 p. m. The property will be sold on reasonable terms. Particulars on posters.

MARCH CIRCUIT COURT RECONVENED MONDAY

Four Criminal Cases Disposed of and a Land Suit Now in Progress.

Monday morning of this week the March non-jury term of the Circuit Court convened in Oakland with Chief Judge Boyd presiding. Associate Judge Henderson's health while improved, is such that his physicians advises a continued cessation from work for some weeks to come.

The first case brought to the attention of the Court was that of the State vs. M. V. Grim, indicted at the December term for rape, the prosecuting witness being Mabel Blocher. The State was represented by State's Attorney Renninger and Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord appeared for the traverser. Verdict not guilty.

A second case of like nature against Grim was then taken up, the prosecuting witness being Goldie Griffith and the traverser was found guilty on the third count of the indictment and sentenced to serve 60 days in jail, pay a fine of $50 and the cost of the prosecution.

Charles A. Hesen, indicted for false pretenses appeared as the traverser in the third criminal case. An indictment was found at the December term charging him with having procured beer to the amount of something over $50 from the agent of the Cumberland Brewing Company on September 1st and in payment therefor issued a check on one of the local banks, which when presented was pronounced worthless, no funds being on deposit to meet the check. In the trial of the case it appears that Hesen had procured beer amounting to about $9 on the day specified in the indictment, the check being in payment of an earlier account and on these grounds he was pronounced not guilty.

Criminal trials No. 4 was that of the State vs. Charles A. Hesen, who had disposed of a horse under execution by the Sheriff. On this charge he was found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of $50 and costs.

CIVIL DOCKET.

No. 68. Loch Haven Lumber Co. vs. John Shartzer & Co.; judgment under the rule for $124.60.

No. 73. P. Welty & Co. vs. Charles A. Hesen; judgment under the rule for $328.19.

No. 31. John J. Winn vs. William Emerson; judgment for $163.53.

No. 21. Z. C. Gibson vs. Sarah E. Schmidt; ejection; now on trial.

In No. 33, Originals, John T. Mitchell vs. Eli Stanton, submitted to the Court on agreed statement of facts and argued before Judge Boyd on March 20th, the Court rendered its decision Tuesday morning holding that the title to the land in question was vested in Mr. Mitchell.

Court will probably terminate on Saturday.

Sell Your Pistol.

Persons who have been in the habit of carrying pistols in West Virginia had better beware, if they do not want to get into trouble. The Legislature enacted a law that will make hard sledding for the pistol toters. If you want to carry a pistol you will have to take out a license and give a bond in the penalty of $3,500. In addition to that you must pay a license fee of $10. If you violate this law and indictment results you must pay a fine and go to jail. Don't forget that you cannot escape the jail sentence. If you are convicted a second time of the same offense you will go to the peniteentiary and also pay a fine. Sell your pistol. If you can't sell it give it away. Don't risk the temptation. It may get you into trouble.—Romney Review.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower since our last report:

John H. Sines, of Sang Run, and Amanda Vansickle, of Fearer.

Charles Lawrence Merrill, of Fairmont, and Stella Goodnight, of Farmington. W. Va.

John Alonzo Duty and Forest Rose Britton, both of Pennsboro, W. Va.

Henry Wilson Friend and Pearl Riley, both of Blooming Rose, Md.

Josiah J. Smearmond, of Accident, and Mrs. Ida Durst, of Grantsville.

Easter Communion Service.

Rev. E. Marges, pastor of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, announces Easter services as follows for Easter Sunday, the 11th inst.: Preparatory services, reception of new members and Holy Communion at 10.30 o'clock in the morning. Special music will be rendered.

18 YEARS FOR MATTINGLY

Killed Brother At Cranesville Over Business.

Joseph Mattingly, who killed his brother, Thomas Mattingly, at Cranesville, W. Va., and was stabbed by the latter in the encounter, was sentenced at Kingwood Saturday to 18 years in the penitentiary. He had been convicted of murder in the second degree. The murder was the result of a misunderstanding over a business transaction.

Judge Holt, at Kingwood, also sentenced Dan Marcerelli, an Italian storekeeper of Newbnrg, W. Va., to four years and six months in the penitentiary. He was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, having killed William Cox, a young railroad man. At the time of the murder a mob sought to lynch Marcerelli, and all that prevented was that a rope was not at hand.

DEATH RECORD.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.

Mr. Robert Campbell, aged 71 years, a well known and highly respected resident of Kitzmiller, died at his home at that place on Monday morning after an illness of six months. Death was due to bright's disease. Mr. Campbell was borne in Scotland in 1838 and came to this country while yet young. The Campbell family settled at Pompey Smash, now Vale Summit, where they lived for a number of years, moving from there to a place near Westernport where they conducted a farm. At the outbreak of the Civil War, Mr. Campbell enlisted in the Federal army and served with honor distinction until the close of the war. After being honorably discharged from the Union army Mr. Campbell went into West Virginia and followed the occupation of a coal miner in the vicinity of Blaine. He was married in 1868 to Miss Malinda Davis, who survives him, together with four sons and four daughters as follows: Messrs. James, Benjamin, Robert and Joseph Campbell, all living near Blaine, and Mrs. Albert Lee, Mrs. Mary Rhodes, Mrs. Maggie Bray and Miss Alice Campbell, who also live in Blaine. He is also survived by two brothers and seven sisters as follows: Hon. James Campbell, Deputy Surveyor of the Port of Baltimore, and Mr. Joseph Campbell, living somewhere in Pennsylvania; Mrs. Margaret Elliott, of Arizona; Mrs. Belle Sullivan, of Akron, Ohio; Mrs. Kate Crooks, of Baltimore; Mrs. Ellen Johnson, of Keyser, W. Va.; Mrs. Annie Tonry, of Westernport; Mrs. Sarah Somerville, of Lonaconing, and Mrs. Harriett Cunningham, whose present whereabouts are unknown, but who is believed to be living in Pennsylvania. The funeral took place on Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock, under the auspices of Hiram Lodge, A. F. and A. M., of which deceased was a member. He was also a member of the Westernport Lodge of Odd Fellows. Interment was made in a private burial ground near Blaine.

MRS. CHARLOTTE WHITE.

Mrs. Charlotte White, widow of the late Benjamin White, died last Saturday at the residence of her son, Mr. S. K. White, in Grafton, W. Va., at an advanced age, and on Monday the remains were shipped from Grafton to Mountain Lake Park, whence they were conveyed to the family burying ground near the White church and interred. The funeral party was accompanied from Grafton by Rev. L. S. Grose, of the West Main Street M. E. church, of which the deceased lady was a member. Her husband died a number of years ago and was buried in the White cemetery.

MRS. BRIDGET KERENS.

Died, at Rowlesburg, W. Va., Tuesday night, very suddenly, Mrs. Bridget Kerens, aged eighty-five years, of Altamont, this county. Mrs. Kerens was the widow of the late Michael Kerens, of Altamont, and on last Saturday went to Rowlesburg to pay relatives a short visit, when she was taken ill her death resulting. She was an aunt of Mr. J. M. Stanton, of Oakland, who went to Rowlesburg yesterday afternoon to superintend the funeral arrangements. The remains of Mrs. Kerhns will be taken to Altamont tomorrow and on Friday her funeral will occur, probably from the Catholic church in Oakland, of which the deceased was a member. She leaves no immediate family.

Receiver Named for Hotel.

In the United States district court at Philippi, W. Va., Judge Dayton presiding, B. G. Williams, proprietor of Skinners' Tavern in Fairmont, has been adjudicated a bankrupt and George Hoge a clerk at Peabody Hotel at Morgantown was appointed a receiver for the hotel, Mr. Williams' assets are estimated at about $100,000 and liabilities at approximately the same amount.

MANY WATER WORKS AND SEWERAGE BIDS

Were Submitted to Council Monday Evening But Contracts Have Not Yet Been Let.

In accordance with the advertisement for bids for the construction of a water works and sewerage system and the erection of a new city building in Oakland, the Mayor and Council received bids on Monday night from contractors according to the specifications and plans submitted by the engineering firm employed by Council for this purpose.

In all twenty-three bidders submitted their figures, some for the construction of the water and sewerage system and also the city building, while others contemplated the erection of the city building only or of the water and sewerage system.

On the two latter items the bids were at great variance ranging from $38,600, the figures of a Joliet, Ill., firm, to about $50,000, the latter figures covering the completion of the entire contract.

Contractors, or their representatives, were present from Elkins, Fairmont, Clarksburg, Meyersdale, Cumberland, Pittsburg and two were local people, who bid on the erection of the city building alone.

As it will require several days to compute and tabulate the bids submitted so that they may be intelligently handled by Council and the members of the advisory committee, the contract will not be awarded for at least a week or more.

BLOOMINGTON.

Messrs. John Rowland and Daniel Walker, of the town of Kitzmiller, were guests of friends and relatives during the week.

The fair and festival held by the ladies of the M. E. church on last Friday and Saturday evenings in the Junior hall, was a decided success in every particular. Enough money was realized to pay the pastor's salary and other incidental expenses.

Dr. Kemp was a visitor to the county seat on Saturday.

A wreck on the Hampshire plane on Monday morning entailed considerable expense on the Masteller Coal Co. Four loaded cars broke loose from the rope shortly after leaving the tip, ran down the plane and collided with the empties, reducing eight cars to kindling wood. If this accident had occurred an hour earlier when the men were riding the plane to work, it would have been attended with serious consequences in the loss of life.

Mrs. Adah Green, wife of James Green, of Elkins, auditor of the W. Va. division of the W. M. R. R., is in town this week visiting relatives. She is accompanied by her two little boys, Bayard and Frederick.

Mrs. Bessie Burleigh and children, of Blaine, left for home on Tuesday, after a very pleasant visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Wolf.

Miss Ansie Conley, of this place, is the guest of relatives at Tunnelton.

Prof. Browning, of Oakland, secretary and examiner of the Garrett County School Board, while on a tour of inspection of the school work in this end of the county, spent a few hours with the Bloomington school on Thursday. His talk to the pupils on education was instructive and entertaining.

Saturday was pay day at the Pattison mine.

Mr. Carter Brendlin turned out with his Masonic brethren on Wednesday, and attended the funeral of Mr. Robert Campbell, at Blaine.

Miss Celia Durnan is lying ill with typhoid fever at the home of her parents on the Nob.

Mr. Robert Grant, Jr., of Elk Garden, accompanied by his wife, spent a few days of this week in town, the guests of relatives.

Mr. William Moody was a business visitor to Cumberland the first of the week.

Ex-County Commissioner Masteller, who recently accepted the position as general manager of the Piedmont and Potomac R. R., with headquarters at Frederickburg, Va., moved to his future home the latter part of the week. He has been a resident of Barnum for the the past twenty-four or twenty-five years, and can be said to have founded the place. His beautiful home which stands on a plateau east of the W. M. R. R. station, is for sale. We understand negotiations are pending with the Monroe Coal Mining Co., of Barnum, for the purchase of the property, and in case the purchase is made, it will be used as a home for the superintendent.

THE INTERRUPTED BANQUET

By RENE BACHE

(Copyright, by Shortstory Pub. Co.)

Though quite familiar with the street, I could not remember having seen that particular house before. My recollection had been that there was a vacant lot just there. But I must have been mistaken, for the dwelling before me was substantial enough, though old-fashioned, with high front steps and large windows. A trifle out of repair it looked, by the way, and I even noticed that two or three panes of glass were gone. On the whole, the mansion presented a somewhat mournful appearance, as if fallen from an old-time respectability into a condition of decay and decrepitude.

I am sure that it would never have occurred to me to enter, had it not been that the young lady who accompanied me turned and deliberately mounted the steps towards the front door. Of course I followed. She did not ring the bell: for, in truth, there seemed to be no bell to pull. But the portal was noiselessly thrown wide from within, and we entered. I looked in vain for the servant who, I supposed, would receive our cards; but, to my surprise, Mabel walked straight ahead through the wide hall, without hesitation, appearing quite familiar with the place. There should have been a light, I thought, though it was only two o'clock in the afternoon; for the interior of this strange mansion was very dark, and I could only make out in an indistinct sort of way the faces that looked down upon me from some old portraits, obviously fine works of art, as I passed.

Mabel had introduced me to most of her friends, for we had been engaged for six months and were to be married very soon; but she had never spoken to me of these people, who, perhaps, were rather out of the fashion and had been forgotten. As these reflections passed through my mind, we ascended a broad staircase to the second floor, and then it was that I heard a sound of revelry which came from a room which I correctly judged to be the dining room of the house. The heavy oaken doors of the room were slightly ajar, and through them was cast a strong beam of light that fell full upon an object which startled me for an instant. It was a headless human figure. A second later I smiled at my own alarm, inasmuch as the figure was nothing but a suit of old armor without the helmet.

If I had had a chance, I should have questioned Mabel, in order to make sure that our unannounced entrance was not an intrusion; also, I might have asked why, after starting out for a day's yachting trip, we had returned so early and for so strange an entertainment. But either query would have been out of place just then. Very likely, I thought, she had some surprise in store for me—a lunch party, maybe, arranged by some friends in our honor; for quite a series of dinners and other entertainments had been given to us in celebration of our engagement. Moreover, all that I have related took place within less than a minute and a half, and in another moment I found myself in the large and brilliantly lighted dining room. If the rest of the mansion was dark, there was no lack of illumination here. I was fairly dazzled by the numerous lights, clusters of which, arranged in silver candelabra, helped to adorn a long table, at which twenty-five or thirty people were seated.

To my astonishment, not one of the people present seemed to take the slightest notice of our entrance. Near one end of the table were two vacant chairs together. Mabel quietly took one of them, and I, deeming the time hardly proper for an explanation, seated myself in the other. Soup was immediately placed before us—evidently we were not very late—and I took two or three spoonsful of it. It struck me as being singularly tasteless.

The courses followed each other in the usual mechanical fashion. What there was to eat I do not remember with any distinctness, for I was so absorbed in wonder and in studying the other guests that I took little notice of the viands. Opposite me was a funny-looking old lady in white silk, cut low at the neck to such a degree, I thought, as would have been more appropriate to a younger and plumper person. I particularly recall the fact that she wore camellias in her hair—a fashion which I had heard of as belonging to a generation ago. It was palpable, too, that her front hair was false. Withal she was most agreeable and amiably disposed, as I presently discovered from her conversation. She was the first person who addressed any remark to me, abruptly making some inquiry about my grandfather, and stating in the same breath that she was from Philadelphia.

At her left sat a gentleman of rather more than middle age, as I judged, with a remarkably pink nose and a great expanse of shirt-front, who was devoting himself so assiduously to his plate that not a word escaped his lips. On the other side of the old lady with the camellias was an extremely thin man, with a peaked countenance, who so strongly reminded me of an undertaker that I felt almost tempted to ask him a question or two about the state of the market in respect to coffins and other funeral equipments. His necktie was black and likewise his hair, while his expression was one of extreme solemnity. Mabel was seated at my right, while on my other hand was a buxom matron of forty or so, who manipulated knife and fork with an activity that suggested a most excellent digestion.

Among the guests these were the first whom I noticed particularly. As I looked along the table, I was rather surprised to find that not a face was known to me. There was a cadaverous-looking young man with a prematurely bald head whom I pointed out to Mabel, asking who he was; for I had noticed that a sign of recognition passed between them.

"My brother," she replied quietly and, as I imagined, sadly.

Now this was a surprise, for I did not know that Mabel had a brother. Perhaps, I thought, he was not an especially estimable youth, and so was ignored by her family. If that were so, why should he be present on this occasion? Here was another puzzle, to be solved when a suitable opportunity offered for questioning my fiancee.

On the left of Mabel's brother was a remarkably pretty, though very pale young lady, who wore in her hair, oddly enough, what looked to me like a bridal wreath. But the handsomest woman present was she whom I supposed to be our hostess. She was of regal presence, and, with her velvety eyes and coronet of black braids, resembled a Spanish senorita. Though I had never seen her before, I took it for granted that she must know who I was, and repeatedly I tried to catch a glance from her; but it was in vain, for her conversation and attention were addressed almost exclusively to an elderly man on her right, apparently a foreign diplomat, as half a dozen orders glittered upon his breast. At the other end of the festive board sat a gentleman with a huge gray mustache, presumably our host. I heard no remarks from him, save now and then a request to "pass the decanter," addressed to one or another of the guests near him. I had no opportunity for speech with him, inasmuch as Mabel and I were divided from him by almost the length of the table.

On the whole, the affair struck me as entirely extraordinary. Here we were, myself completely a stranger, at a banquet in a house which I had never visited before! Indeed, had it not been for Mabel's assurance of welcome and the two seats apparently reserved for us, I should have supposed that we had made some mistake. Mabel herself was singularly silent, though ordinarily quite talkative and even jolly, and offered no explanation of the situation. But perhaps what astonished me more than anything else was my discovery, some time after we were seated at the table, of a young man, some distance away, who bore a striking resemblance to my chum at college. Upon my word, I was on the point of shouting at him across the board. In fact, the words, "Why, Bill, old man, how did you get here?" were on my lips, when I checked myself in time, owing to a remembrance of the fact that Bill had been dead for eight years, having met a most untimely fate in a railway disaster.

While engaged in wondering whether the young man could be a near relation of my former chum's, I was startled at seeing a telegram in the familiar Western Union envelope laid beside my plate. Some people, notably stock brokers and newspaper men, are accustomed to telegrams, and for that reason are not alarmed by them. But habit had not rendered me thus callous, and with some haste I tore open the envelope and glanced over the contents. It read:

"Mabel died this morning of acute congestion of the lungs. Amelia Parker."

I declare that I trembled as if I had a chill. If Mabel had not been by my side, I should have been overcome by the shock. Holding the telegram before Mabel's eyes, I exclaimed in a voice that trembled with conflicting emotions of horror and anger: "This is carrying a practical joke too far. Here, some brainless wretch telegraphs me in your mother's name that you are dead."

Careless of the almost frenzied energy with which I spoke, I looked around upon the faces of my fellow-guests as one does who is confident of sympathy. To my amazement, in response to my speech, there arose a cackle of laughter which was presently transformed into a general ripple of mirth. And such mirth! The like of it I had never heard before, and, please heaven, I hope I never may again. It was not like real laughter, but rather the empty and strident cachinnation of beings lost to the feelings of humanity.

Pale with anger, I rose to my feet and, steadying myself with one hand on the back of my chair, exclaimed:

"What does this mean?"

Dead silence was the only response. Conversation had ceased, but I felt that every eye was fixed upon me. Aghast, I looked at Mabel, but she did not return my gaze. At length, the old woman with the camellias in her hair, who sat opposite, addressed me, saying:

"Why do you think that Mabel is not dead?"

"Good God!" I replied. "Here she is. Don't you see her? What do these people mean?"

The old woman grinned and waved her feather fan at me, playfully, saying:

"Ask her if she isn't dead?"

I turned to Mabel in wonderment, but she only shook her head sadly.

"Why, of course she's dead!" said the old woman. "Don't you know that all of us here are dead?"

"Indeed, yes; we are all dead," cried the other guests in general chorus.

"This is getting beyond patience!" I exclaimed. "You, too, are pleased to joke with me, but I tell you frankly that I fail to see the fun of it. Perhaps, since you possess such a fund of humor, you will be telling me next that I am dead, also."

Then came that laugh again. I never shall forget it. Beginning with a cackling titter, it spread until the whole table was in a roar, making my very flesh creep. Then all at once it ceased, and again there was dead silence.

"Certainly you are dead," said the old lady with the camellias. "She's dead, and all of us are dead. She died this morning of acute congestion of the lungs, but I have been dead for these 20 years, and he, too," indicating with her fan the elderly gentleman with the pink nose. "My own complaint was cerebro-spinal meningitis."

My legs gave way under me and I sank into my chair. As I did so my hand touched Mabel's, and I grasped hers tightly. It was cold as ice. Leaning toward me, she whispered in my ear:

"Don't make a scene! It is all quite true. You were run over an hour ago by a trolley car."

Not daring to believe my senses, I replied:

"And this house—?"

"Sh—h!" said Mabel. "It is only the ghost of a house—the phantasmal reproduction of an old mansion that used to stand on this spot, where there has been an empty lot for 15 years past."

"I—I think I understand," I gasped. Then, though my brain swam, I made a tremendous effort to summon up my courage and face composedly this dreadful situation. Addressing myself to the old woman opposite, I said:

"Perchance you were acquainted with the former occupants of this dwelling?"

"Oh, yes," she answered pleasantly. "I am somewhat distantly related to our host and hostess of this evening. They were drowned—lost on the ill-fated Ville de Paris. This house belonged to them, and not very long afterwards it was torn down."

"But suppose that the present owner of the lot were to build upon it?" I suggested. "It would be necessary to hold these charming entertainments elsewhere?"

"Not at all," she said, laughing and waving her fan. "The occupancy of the site by a real house would not interfere. It frequently happens, of course, that a building is put up on ground previously occupied by another dwelling. You must understand, though I might have supposed you knew it, that, while the material parts of a tenement may be removed at any time, its astral shell remains in perpetuity. Thus the ghosts of half a dozen or more dwellings may remain on the site occupied by a new and substantial structure. They are none the less real for being invisible to living eyes. The most remarkable instances of haunted houses that you have heard about are due to conditions of that sort—several families of phantasms, perhaps, tenanting premises topographically coincident with a mansion which affords physical accommodation to people in the flesh. I trust I make myself clear?"

"Quite so," I replied politely.

This conversation was interrupted by the elderly gentleman with the pink nose, who seemed to be dissatisfied with something. Having poured out a water goblet half full of sherry from a decanter, he called for brandy, and with those strong spirits filled it to the brim. Then he took a caster of red pepper and sprinkled its contents liberally on the surface of the mixture. Raising the goblet to his lips, he drained its contents to the last drop and set it down with a sigh.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, "it has no strength. If only I could get a schooner of real beer."

The old lady regarded this performance attentively, with a lorgnette held to her nose. Said she sympathetically:

"That is the way with all pleasures in the after world. They seem to have no savor. Even the milk is chalk and water."

"I suppose that is why this mince pie tastes so insipid," I responded, toying absently with a bit of pastry on my plate.

"Of course it is," she said. "Don't you see it is only the ghost of a mince pie."

"Then it seems that—"

But at this point the banquet was suddenly interrupted by a convulsive swaying and creaking of timbers. The table rocked, the lights in the silver candelabra flickered, and all was darkness. Then, through a ray of brilliant sunlight, I saw the strange dining-hall, the gleaming table, the ghostly banqueters all fade into the distance. Another moment of utter darkness, of creaking and swaying, during which I made a desperate effort to grasp and steady Mabel's chair. To my bewilderment, my hand touched a coil of rope. I heard familiar voices. There was a burst of sunlight. I sat propped up by cushions on the deck of the pleasure yacht Undine, surrounded by solicitous friends. Mabel, with her warm hand reassuringly clasped in mine, told me of my half hour's unconsciousness. I had fallen overboard in my attempt to recover her hat, and had been rescued only after sinking for the third time. Not until I had heard all this, could I banish from my mind my horrible experience in the house of the dead.

HORTICULTURE

PLANNING A FAMILY ORCHARD.

What One Farmer Planted for His Own Needs.

In arranging an orchard for the use of the family, there are several things to consider. It must be located convenient to the dwelling house, to save time and labor in gathering small quantities of fruit. It should, if possible, be located on land that will afford the best natural advantages, in the way of type of soil, and exposure to the sun, etc., and the orchard should be so arranged that the fruit nearest the house will commence to fruit first in the season.

A variety of fruits should be selected to furnish a supply of fresh fruit throughout the entire season, and at the same time furnish enough of late fruit to store for the winter; therefore, it is necessary to plant trees from the earliest to the latest fruiting.

Following I give a sample of my own fruit orchard for family use which I think after several years of use to be convenient and profitable, writes R. B. Rushing, in Farmers' Voice. I have a piece of land containing 1½ acres, lying south of my dwelling house, with a southeastern gradual exposure, of soil specially adapted to the growing of fruits.

This plat is 20 rods long, by 12 rods wide. I have 91 cherry trees one rod apart each way.

In the center of the orchard, south of the cherry trees, I have 36 grape vines, rows running east and west four hills long. They are grown by the row method, as I think I grow more that way than by the hill method.

Just east of the grape vines I have 20 peach trees, which consist of both early and late peaches.

West and south of the grape vines and peach trees, I have 41 early and late apple trees, with the early nearest the house.

As to my reason for this arrangement, the first fruit ripe in the spring are the cherries. I have them so that wife will not have to go to the back of the field to get her supplies for the table and canning. And for the benefit of the reader, as I go along I will give a partial account of what this little plat of ground is bringing in dollars and cents beside supplying my family with plenty of good, fresh, wholesome fruits the year round.

My orchard is 12 years old, and not doing its best yet. For the last five years I have shipped, or sold, an average of 50 cases of cherries beside what we have used for canning, etc. The 50 cases each year have netted me $1.25 per case, which is $75 per year from the cherries alone, above what we used.

Having few early peaches I have sold none except to neighbors, of which I kept no record. But we have had an abundance of very excellent fruit ourselves. I should say that for the past five years I have sold as much as $10 per year.

We have had for six years all the grapes we wanted to use, and for the last four years I have sold an average of 1,000 pounds at two cents per pound, which is $20 per year, above family use.

The apples are just now beginning to do something good. I have been getting a small quantity for the last four years, but since they were seven years old they have supplied the table, plenty for winter, and an occasional treat for the neighbors.

In the last three years I have sold above what we used, an average of one bushel to the tree, at from 50 cents to one dollar per bushel or about $25 per year, for the last three years. From now on they will do much better.

As to profits, the total orchard has furnished plenty of fruit for our family, and an average of $130 for the last four years. Of course I laid out the use of the land practically for the first six or seven years, and was out some little expense of handling, but I think I received pay for all that from keeping poultry on this land.

PRUNING PEAR TREES.

Experiments to Prove the Value of Different Methods.

The following experiment in pruning Kieffer pear trees was made last season and will be repeated to determine the relative value of time when to prune, writes an Indiana farmer in Farmers' Review:

Experiment No. 1—One-half all new wood was cut back before any sign of the bud expanding in the spring.

Experiment No. 2—Same was done to other trees when buds were ready to open.

Experiment No. 3—When in full bloom and ready to drop the bloom other trees were cut back one-half.

Nothing further was done, the trees needing no pruning otherwise.

Now for results: they were just in the order as was the pruning. Those trees pruned early gave the best fruit this year and the wood growth was good. Those pruned second did not do as well as the preceding, neither in fruit nor wood. The third lot gave poor fruit and but little wood growth.

This is only one trial. There may have been other causes for this result, but we expect to continue the same process another season to determine the matter more fully. We will also try the same process on other varieties than Kieffer.

MR. HENPECK'S EXPLANATION.

Why do I stand around and toe
The mark the way I do?
Why is it that I cannot go
Down to the club with you?
The answer's very simple, friend,
You should not be surprised;
I've thought it out unto the end
She has me hypnotized.

At early morn, when it is cold,
She bids me light the fire,
I meekly do as I am told,
I fear to rouse her ire.
To ever cross her in her whims,
I think were ill-advised;
I've greater strength in all my limbs,
But, then, I'm hypnotized.

Upon the outside porch I smoke,
That wife of mine to please;
I tell you what, it is no joke,
To stand with trembling knees
Explaining what has kept you late,
Like one who is despised;
The reason, though, I'm free to state,
She has me hynotized.

She's short and I am very tall,
She's weak and I am strong;
But size for nothing counts at all,
When woman says you're wrong.
You're wrong—that's all there is to it,
I don't get exercised,
I find it better to submit,
She has me hynotized.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Where the Road Goes.

"Where does this road go?" I asked of a small boy whose steps intercepted mine along the woodland way, white with snow.

"Aw, it goes on into town," replied the lad, with a look of scorn at my ignorance.

I thanked him and plodded forward, musing as I went.

"Surely this road does more than that?" I questioned, speaking to myself.

There had been a liberal fall of snow the night before and now the sun was casting silhouettes of shade and shadow through the interstices of the trees. A single sled track mingled with that of the trudging lad I had passed, guiding my footsteps through the fairy realms of argent and brown.

To my right a rabbit bounded from a clump of hazel brush and started on his circling, tangent way. Instantly there sprang to my lips the stop-rabbit whistle of my youth. Twice I piped three soft, coaxing whistles. The rabbit slackened his pace, turned and sat bolt upright, a quivering, curious bunch of gray upon a sea of down! As I moved forward whistling, he bobbed off again.

Beside my way a huge tree lay prostrate and as I drew nearer there was a scurry of wings, a flutter of feathers and a golden pheasant wheeled off into the protecting shadows.

"Ah," said I, "Surely this road does more than wander aimlessly to the village. It winds through an Eden of life and beauty. It wends its silent way past the great linden trees where the squirrels live and the bluejay screams and the crow swings in his aerial flight far above. I am going to like this road!"

The wind sang merrily, softly through the wood, now and then scattering the feathery snow heaps from the crotches of the trees, waving the airy plumes of the low bushes until they scraped fantastic traceries upon the bosom of the snow. Here a woodsman, lowly son of a great craftsman gone forever from our vicinity, had felled a giant oak, razing in half an hour that which had taken centuries to grow!

Winding about, I passed under interlocking branches, the great hands of two giant elms clasping each other across the roadway. Behind me a hill shut out the view and in front the road veered sharply into the thick wood.

"Ah, how often," I thought, "has romance had its portrayal here! This is Cupid's lair, where he shoots his shafts at lovers on their homeward way from the village, and many a time, I know, has the buxom, sweet-faced country lassie lost a kiss and gained one underneath these spreading trees!"

The road ran by a dilapidated rail fence—decaying lineal descendant of thousands of fences of its kind now reduced to ashes and oblivion. Beyond, barren cornstalks, sentinel-like, stood guard above a whitened field. The adamantine door of Winter was closed against its verdure shut within.

"But beneath that cold blanket," I mused, "lies life and harvest, hope and its answer. Within that cold embrace is strength and virility, the dormant seed that with the kiss of spring will awaken to new beauty!"

And then the church spire of the village rose to view. Passing over a rude bridge I came to the first cottage, lowly and poor. A red-faced woman was scolding a dog. There was a broken window-pane calked with a faded calico wrapper. The curtains were awry and tawdry, chickens stood one-legged upon the front stoop. There was an ash barrel and a dry-goods box in the front yard and a yellow dog sprang out at me, barking furiously.

"Ah," said I, turning upon my heel. "The boy was right after all. He said the road 'gist went on into town.' He must have been thinking of the town when he spoke, and not of the road!"

Half way back I met the boy.

"Where have you been?" I ask striving not to appear impertinent.

"Twistin' a rabbit out of a log with a forked stick," he replied, exhibiting the luckless form of poor Bunny.

"Oh," I replied, sadly. "He was such a pretty, living thing when I saw him a few minutes ago!"

"Aw, rabbits ain't good fur nothin' but t'eat," argued the boy, defiantly.

"Where do you live?" I inquired.

"First house past the bridge," said the boy, pointing.

"I might have guessed it," I said again talking to myself as I continued my way homeward.

Good Music Brightens Home Life.

By WALTER DAMROSCH, Leader of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

THERE would be fewer divorces if there were more high grade music in the home, and the little love god would stay longer were he nourished on the elevating strains of good music.

There is more domestic discord in the American home than in that of any other country on the globe, and I believe it is because there is not enough cultivation of the FINER THINGS of life.

THERE IS LITTLE FAMILY MUSIC OR ART OF ANY KIND, AND THERE IS SMALL WONDER THAT ELEMENTS OF DISCORD ENTER WHEN THERE IS NOTHING MORE DIVERTING THAN CALCULATION ON THE COST OF BUTTER, EGGS AND BACON.

The multimillionaires of our country are discovering that money does not take away any of their dissatisfaction with life, does not reduce their family life to utopian or even bearable conditions and does not give the REAL PLEASURES OF LIFE.

What is there resting to the tired husband in the tedious recital of estimates on the repletion of the family larder? What can the weary wife find of interest in the shop talk of her husband's business?

This fact is better recognized in the homes of other countries, where there is a GREATER COMPANIONSHIP between members of the family and where the day's routine is not rehearsed for the evening's entertainment. There is not so apt to be a violent disagreement over Beethoven's symphonies as there is over the price of beefsteak.

EVERY CHILD, BOYS AS WELL AS GIRLS, SHOULD BE REARED IN THE ATMOSPHERE OF MUSIC SO THAT THE BEST PART OF THEIR NATURES MAY FULLY DEVELOP.

Individuality Is the Controlling Element In Man.

By Professor WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH of Rochester, N. Y.

OUR personality, the individuality, is worth more than all else in social life. It is not only our most valuable asset, but the most valuable contribution we can give to society.

THE GREAT PROBLEM, THEREFORE, IS FOR US TO INCORPORATE IN OURSELVES THE NEW IDEALS WHICH COME TO US AND SO BE ABLE TO IMPART THEM TO OTHERS. IN DOING THIS WE MUST SACRIFICE MUCH THAT WE HAVE HELD SACRED.

Anything which can be shown in a living personality is worth more than scores of speeches. If a man has incorporated the ideals of social democracy he becomes A FORCE in the community simply because of his living on the earth.

Every revolution in the history of the world has had its birth in a few GREAT MINDS.

THERE IS A SLAVERY OF ENVIRONMENT AND CIRCUMSTANCES THAT BINDS EVERY MAN, PARTICULARLY IN THE BUSINESS WORLD AND THE PUBLIC PRESS. BUT THE SOUL IS FREE AND CAN RISE, BY THE ACT OF FAITH AND WILL, TO FREEDOM FROM THE CONVENTIONALITY OF ENVIRONMENT.

The act of the will determines what attitude we have toward our own professions. For instance, it enables the preacher to become a prophet instead of a courtier. And so with all the professions. The MAN HIMSELF determines what they shall be and how they shall be used.

Bible the Most Interesting of Books.

By Senator ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE of Indiana.

WHEN in search of GOOD READING turn to the Bible. When in need of hard material advice on hard material subjects, turn to the Bible. Whether in search of exciting tales of battle, of tales of love, of tales of the goodness of humanity, ALWAYS TURN TO THE BIBLE. It contains all of this and much more.

NO STORIES PUBLISHED IN THE MAGAZINES OF TODAY HAVE SUCH GRIPPING INTEREST AS THE STORIES IN THE BIBLE.

Purely as a volume of entertainment I have often wondered that the Bible is not more widely read. Like other gifts of God, it is so common that WE FAIL TO APPRECIATE IT.

Universal Peace Is Here to Stay.

By the Rev. Dr. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS of Brooklyn.

WITH our international politics the kingdom of God has come. The passing of war is here. UNIVERSAL PEACE IS UPON US.

With the coming of the Marconigram every navy of the world is in the CENTER OF THE STAGE. The message that flies through air and heralds around the world the slightest movement of any ship of war has OBLITERATED THE DARKNESS.

THERE IS NO NEED OF NAVIES. THERE IS NO NEED THAT MORE NAVIES SHOULD BE BUILT. WITH THE NEXT HAGUE CONGRESS LET US WITNESS THE DISSOLUTION OF THE WORLD'S ARMIES. LET THAT MESSAGE OF PEACE BE PERMANENT AND CONTINUE AD INFINITUM.

Worry Is American Man's Worst Enemy.

By W. LESTER BODINE, Superintendent of Education of Chicago.

WORRY is the greatest single enemy of the modern American man. Woman may fret, but man worries.

WORRY HAS KILLED MORE MEN THAN ALL THE DISEASES PUT TOGETHER.

Man carries his worries home with him. He gets PREMATURELY GRAY over them. Business is his love, his life and frequently his death. The death rate among men is about twenty to the thousand. Among women it is only seventeen to the thousand.

WHAT IT COSTS.

Working People Have to Take Care of Paupers and Criminals.

The estimate of the cost of taking care of the helpless poor and the decidedly vicious classes presents some startling figures. The figures run much higher when we count the cost of buildings, the salaries of officials and the loss of the productive energy which ought to be adding to the resources of the community.

The pauper and the criminal, if engaged in honest industry, would be adding to the common wealth. As it is, there is that much which they fail to contribute, and then the other workers have to support them at a cost which sometimes is felt to be heavy. Indeed, if men who now rail at those who seem to have greater wealth than they were to study the matter more closely they would see that the indolent pauper and the criminal are burdens to the poor man.

Directly or indirectly the industrious working people are required to help support those who will not work and others whom it is not safe to have at large.

The pauper and the criminal are the real foes of the man who has to work hard for his living, for out of his earnings there must go something to support in idleness some who are as able to work as he is.

It would be astonishing if it were not so common to note the willingness of so many to settle down into idleness and dependence upon others. They seem to have no scruple whatever in eating the bread they have not earned, and so the expenses of the industrious are made needlessly large to support the idlers, the incompetent and the reckless.

In these days, when the wealth of the rich excites so much envy, and when the extravagance of many calls out rebukes from the working people, we must not forget that the burdens of the workers do not come from that source, or not alone from that source, but from people who have nothing and who earn nothing.

DRUNKARD AS A FUN MAKER.

No Longer Are Their Antics Tolerated in Decent Society.

There has been quite a change of late in the tastes of many of the people. They are not so much entertained by the pranks and the sayings of the drunkard as they once were. There have been times when the befuddled, staggering, yelling creature who was trying to get to his home excited the merriment of the people who saw him on his way.

His vagaries, as represented by the comic performer on the stage, were regarded as excruciatingly funny.

It is a very hopeful sign of the improvement of the public taste, says Temperance, when we find that the antics and the jests of the drunkard have ceased to be as amusing as they once were.

There has been a general improvement in the public taste in other directions.

Once the babbling of lunatics and their erratic behavior attracted people to the jails where the mad folk were then detained.

It is said that it added much to the joys of a visit to Boston to go over the old Cambridge jail and have a laugh at the odd things the crazy people did and said there.

He would be regarded to-day as a lunatic himself who could find enjoyment in watching deranged people.

We may hope that the growth of good taste, not to speak of any higher principle, may become so strong that the drunkard will cease altogether to be a fun maker.

When you consider the heights from which one falls when he becomes a drunkard, and the degradation of his manhood; when you think of the risks he runs, not knowing to what awful deeds he may be tempted while the intoxication lasts—you will not find yourself moved to laughter, but rather to tears, as you look at him.

Consumption of Alcohol in Europe.

A recent issue of La Revue, one of the great Paris journals, gives some statistics as to the consumption of alcohol in Europe. In France the consumption of alcohol has increased during the last 50 years from two to nine litres per head per annum, and in Belgium the increase is from six to nine litres. In other countries the consumption of alcohol has decreased. In Germany, however, it is still eight litres per head per annum, but in England it has fallen to 5 litres, in Norway it has fallen to three, and in Switzerland it has fallen to four litres. In Sweden in 1850 it was 22 litres per head per annum, but in 1900 it was 7 litres. France used to be the country where the least amount of brandy was consumed, but to-day it heads the list.

Drunkenness in City of London.

Last year, the police commissioner states, 1,609 offenses under the liquor laws were dealt with at the justice rooms of the city of London. Simple drunkenness accounted for 902 and drunkenness with aggravations for 683; while there were 24 other offenses. Of the men charged 324 were discharged, 1,050 convicted; and of the women 128 were discharged, and 107 convicted.

DEW PONDS OF THE ANCIENTS

Description of Prehistoric Method of Obtaining Water Supply.

One of the prehistoric methods used in securing a water supply in sections where it was impossible to secure it from natural sources, or where it became necessary to live on elevated territory for defense was by construction of dew ponds. These dew ponds were made by hollowing out the earth for a space far in access of the apparent requirements of such a pond, then thickly covering the whole of the hollow with a coating of straw. The straw in its turn was covered by a layer of well chosen, finely puddled clay, and the upper surface of the clay closely strewn with stones.

Such a pond will gradually become filled with water, the more rapidly the larger it is, even though no rain may fall. During the warmth of a summer day the earth will store a considerable amount of heat, while the pond, protected from the heat by the nonconductivity of the straw, it at the same time chilled by the process of evaporation from the puddled clay. The consequence is that during the night the moisture of the comparatively warm air is condensed on the surface of the cold clay. As the condensation during the nights is in excess of the evaporation during the day, the pond becomes night by night, gradually filled.—Popular Mechanics.

Nourishment in Sugar.

It is said that there is 25 per cent. more nourishment in sugar than any other food that can be purchased for the same money except wheat flour and corn.

Begin Your Work.

By all means begin your folio: even if the doctor does not give you a year, even if he hesitates about a month, make one brave push and see what can be accomplished in a week. COL. ROOSEVELT'S TRIP.

Colonel Roosevelt's hunting excursion into the wilds of Africa is taken by some to be only a personal pleasure trip useless in its nature and having no good object save that of providing physical exercise for the former strenuous president. But they should be reminded that Colonel Roosevelt's expedition does have another object or two. The Pittsburg Gazette-Times notes them as follows:

"He wants to study the wild animals of that untamed region and to collect specimens for the Smithsonian institution. He wants to refresh his body and mind by getting far from the maddening crowd, by turning his back upon adulation and fuss, and by a complete and novel departure from all things to which he has been accustomed and subjected during a very strenuous and nerve-racking period. He wants also, and this is the prime purpose of his long journey into the world, to escape any suggestion that President Taft's administration is but a mere replicant of his own."

These reasons are sufficient. Colonel Roosevelt will not only be performing a duty, but will also endeavor to produce as much good out of that hunt as he possibly can. All hope he will meet with success in scientific research and along other lines. He is entitled to a change of scene and action after the work he has done as president. Besides, who knows but what the great American may become acquainted with certain conditions of governmental administration in Africa, whence scandals have from time to time arisen, and through his knowledge and experience be enabled to wield his pen and influence toward ameliorating any such conditions?

If the Roosevelt trip turns out to be utterly useless, it will not only be a radical departure from the Roosevelt characteristics and the Roosevelt accomplishments, but multitudes of his admiring friends will be surprised and fooled.

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION.

Although the new administration is only a little more than four weeks old it is already apparent that the new tub will stand on its own bottom. This does not mean a departure from the great policies of the Roosevelt administration but rather a change of methods. Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt hold similar ideals but each has a distinctive personality and Mr. Taft must accomplish his work in his own way. He is noted for his ability to handle large matters smoothly and with little friction. Already he is on friendly terms with Senators and Representatives of both parties and the old animosities between Congress and the White House have vanished as if by magic. In the matter of appointments in the South the President will pursue a policy of conciliation. He began by naming a like-long Democrat from that section to be a member of his abinet and followed this up by naming a white man for the collectorship of Charleston in place of Dr. Crum, thus indicating that he would not appoint to office any man, white or black, who was unacceptable to the people whom he had to serve. Now comes the news that Democratic Senators from the certain Southern States will be consulted regarding appointments in their States. A good many Republicans will wonder at all this and many more will be up in arms against this policy. But over against this it must be realized that our President is a clear-headed and far-sighted statesman; that he is the leader of his party and that today he knows that not an electoral vote goes to his party from the far South, largely because the party in a number of those States is in the hands of men who have no ambition to win victories for any except for the selfish one of seizing the Federal offices. If ever the party is to be respected in the South it must be in the hands of high-minded, unselfish men whose first concern will be winning recruits instead of Federal offices. Wherever Republicans of that stamp are at work they will need have no fear that they will be supported and consulted by the Taft administration. And they are at work in Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and other States. South Carolina gave Taft less that 4,000 votes while North Carolina gave him over 100,000.

TARIFF PROGRESS.

During the present week it is likely that the extra session Congress will eliminate glittering generalities from the tariff debate and get down to dealing with the practical details in a direct-to-the-point, business-like manner. Upon the majority party representation in both branches of Congress rests the responsibility of so shaping the Payne bill in its final form that it will supply a revenue to meet the demands of a country that is growing bigger both in population and commercial and industrial enterprise year by year. The difficulties of the readjustment task are heightened by the obligation, to so balance the rates that home industries will be adequately protected without being overprotected and to so plan the maximum and minimum scheme that this country may meet the tariff systems of other countries on equal terms.

Various amendments to the bill as reported will probable be considered this week. The most important phase of the original measure to which alterations have been suggested is undoubtedly the maximum and minimum plan. Alterations will probably be made in thh dual rate scheme which will eliminate objectionable features without weakening the plan in the accomplishment of the purposes for which it is designed. But the measure as it finally passes will be upon the maximum and mimimum plan, for the reason that the special tariff treaty method, which has been necessary under the Dingley and other tariff acts, has been found entirely too cumbersome to be satisfactory. The United States must be put in a position to negotiate trade regulations with those countries employing the double rate, without the enactment of special trade treaties which are in effect new tariff legislation.

A commendable feature of the Payne bill as originally drafted is its recognition of the fact that cheap and more easily available raw materials are as needful to the success of certain branches of American manufacturing industries as protection against foreign competition in the home market. Free iron ore means the building up of American steel industries upon a basis that will mean the supplying of seventy per cent. of the steel of the entire world, and free hides means that this country will be put in position to dominate the shoe trade of the world. While free ore works mainly to the advantage of the coastal steel plants, it is to be remembered that it is these tidewater plants that will chiefly produce the wares that are sold in foreign markets.

SITTING ON THE LID.

Once upon a time, it will be recalled, President Roosevelt, after leaving Washington, remarked that he had left Secretary Taft there sitting on the lid. Well, Mr. Taft is still doing that, and he is doing it as President of the United States. He is displaying all the signs of making good. The quiet manner in which he is going about the government business, his brief message to congress on the tariff bill, his determination to have cabinet members to run their own departments and be responsible for their own bureau troubles, the elimination of the White House as a news agency—all these are refreshing and sensible methods.

But better than all else is the policy of retrenchment which is to be pursued and now the expressed determination, as reported by the Associated Press, to save what are known as the necessaries of life from undue burdens in the tariff bill. By "necessaries" foodstuffs and clothing are meant. The President's idea is that duties upon them shall be as low as possible consistent with the principle of protection. Disavowing any inclination to dictate to congress, and refraining from venturing to suggest details, the President is letting it be known through members and senators who visit him what his general purpose is, and we may be sure that the knowledge of his wishss will have due weight in the further consideration of a vexed subject.

It is evident from developments of the past week that the tariff problem is in for a thorough threshing out this time, and that the president is determined, if possible, to find a middle ground between the extreme protectionists and the radical revisionists upon which a majority may meet and agree. At the moment the situation appears to be more complex than ever. During the campaign last fall the public was led to believe that if duties on iron and steel, coal and lumber, tin and glass were reduced this country would again blossom as the rose, and we should all have cheap living and high wages. Now is beginning to dawn upon some folks that low duty on steel rails or pig iron will not necessarily reduce the cost of living though it may reduce wages, and the cry is for changes that will affect foodstuffs and clothing. What might suit Pittsburgh, along this line, will not gratify Iowa and Kansas, Rochester or New York. Even Mississippi, through its leading Democratic representative, is going to fight both lower lumber duties and certain food schedules. Thus it is apparent that, with the best intentions toward the consumer, the President is opening up one phase of the question which will require very delicate handling, if not a complete surrender of cherished theories.

SAVE THE STATE RECORDS.

What the plastic art of Greece is for its history as read in the light of modern reseach, what the cuneiform characters on the baked tablets of the countries of the ancient east are for the deciphering of Assyrian and Babylonish history today, the records that seem to many persons but so much junk, will be to the historian of America in the future. Only the students who undertake to collate the source of American history at even so recent a period as the the era preceding the Revolution, can realize the scantiness of materials for the history of a period that was pregnant with the movements that made the American nation. As for state records, there are few of the older states that had enlightenment enough to think for the future.

It is not so much a matter of censure that the settlers of colonies generally did not take the long look into the future as that of Governor Bradford of Massachusetts, and his associates, who were firm in the belief that they had been raised up for the creation of a great commonwealth in the new world. But it is deplorable in the extreme that at a time when the world was looking to the lusty young nation and prophesying great things for it, that the invaluable letters and records of the colonies and eminent patriots were being treated as so much waste paper. The development of the historical instinct in America has been a slow process. But this may in part be explained by the lack of historical perspective. Even this affords slight excuse, as the earliest of the patriotic legion were fond of deriving parallels from the republics of the classic period, for the background of their own experience in self-government.

Professor Andrews, of the historical department of the Johns Hopkins University, in his recent address before a body bent upon saving the residue of historical materials in Maryland that may yet be in private possession, gave some startling incidents of the wanton waste of historical materials through ignorance and carelessness. A distinguished visitor to this country at the Roosevelt inauguration makes amazed comment upon the lack of system and order in the care of the documentary features of the state and other departments at Washington. Yet the degree of carefulness of Uncle Sam at the present time is worthy of high commendation as compared with the attitude of the government departments toward the invaluable adjuncts of history a decade or so ago

Maryland is rich in historical records, yet there are great and irreparable lapses. Even so recent a writer as Scharf had available materials for historical reference that has disappeared, so that some of his statements are beyond substantiation from the sources. The editing of the archives of the state has been a masterful piece of work. These and the recovery of the Calvert papers from a condition perilously near to obliteration in England, affords the state a fine basis for historical research. But in some of the states, persons permitted free access to the records have carried them away by the armful and has never returned them. The custodian, often a janitor, regarded them as worthless rubbish, being indifferent to their fate. A country is richer in nothing than its history. Nothing is as important to preserve as the truth of the past, nothing so inspiring, nothing so educative, So that the vandalism of those who wilfully or ignorantly destroy historical materials should be made punishable, as the wanton destruction of the money currency of the country.

TO MAKE SURVEY OF RIFLE RANGE

Will Be Located in Preston County, West Virginia.

Preliminary to the purchase of the rifle range in Preston county, West Virginia, for the use of the West Virginia National Guard, the recent legislature having appropriated $10,000 for that purpose, a survey of the property is being made. The rifle range contains about 200 acres and the ground has some historical interest, being one of the first cultivated farms in the State. The property formerly belonged to Col. John Fairfax, brother of Lord Fairfax, and was settled in 1769, one of the oldest settlements of the State. Assistant Adjutant General C. C. Pierce will go to Morgantown in a few days and will ask Capt. Harry Eaton, of the regular army, who is in command of the cadets at the university, and Major Burns, the regular army officer connected with the guards, to go to Preston county, and with the benefit of their army experience make some plans for laying out the rifle range.

A Correction.

In last week's issue of this paper it was stated that the County Commissioners would meet on the 16th inst. to lay the levy for the next year, whereas the date should have been the 13th inst.

APRIL WEATHER.

Cold and Wet the Chering Promise for Coming Month.

The weather for April, as forecast by Peter R. Smith, is as follows,

There are a number of exciting elements which comes to the front at different dates in April, keeping the meteorology in a state of spasmodic excitement, causing much cloudiness and wet weather. At the opening of the month many thundershowers, rains of much vigor, and snow flurries will show up in many different places, and also destructive storms of wind in southern parts.

On the 1st, 2d and 3d storms of much energy will be on transit in all sections of the country, both north and south, differing in the character of their intensity in proportion to climatic and surfaces causes. The period of disturbances may be prolonged till after the 6th.

What may generally be anticipated, rains of much vigor will be experienced through the south, western, and central part. Also in connection with the storms of rain the clouds will be charged with electricity and destructive winds will prevail in many parts. Snow will materialize in some portions in the north. Sharp, cool weather will follow; also frosty nights.

On the 7th, 8th and 9th a renewal of disturbed weather conditions will develop. Rains and snow flurries will prevail in many parts of the country, both in central as well as in northern parts. The period may be prolonged by cloudiness and light rains. At the close of the period frost will show up.

The 13th is the center of a disturbed period which will start in the west with a warm wave on or touching the 11th, and be followed by a very cool wave about the 15th. The exciting causes will develop clouds charged with much electricity, rain, hail, and destructive winds. All of these phenomena of nature will be experienced in many places before the close of the period.

The 18th, 19th and 20th will be touched by a very warm wave, developing showers of rain, hail, and severe storms of wind in many places. A cool wave will follow.

The last storm period of April centers on the 20th, which will be characterized by high temperature and rain. Then the last three days of the month will be quite cool and the nights frosty.

BITTINGER.

The manufacture of maple sugar is a very important industry in this remote quarter of Garrett county and while the delicious products of the maple tree cannot be classed as necessary, yet it is a very wholesome luxury, out of which considerable profit is realized by buyers and dealers, and but a comparatively small profit by the sturdy farmer who manufactures it. In view of the strenuous labor connected with the gathering and converting of the drippings from the maple tree into syrup and sugar, he it is who deserves and should receive the greatest profit, and as it is well known that the consumer of the maple sugar crop pays very high prices for the most inferior and adulterated sugar at their retailers, the camp owners are beginning to awaken to the fact that they can dispose of their output at better prices than local buyers offer and are therefore seeking and finding markets elsewhere and are shipping direct to the cities and we predict that this movement will grow until those who speculate on the maple sugar crop of Garrett county will have to pay the farmer better prices for the sweets which they gather at so great an expenditure of labor and comfort.

Miss Fannie Brenneman returned to her home at this place last week, after spending a few weeks in Baltimore.

C. E. Ellithorp sold a valuable colt to Samuel Broadwater, of New Germany, last week.

A young man who gave his name as Holtsman and who was driving from Oakland to Williamsport, Md., was arrested at this place last Friday afternoon by order of Sheriff Brown and was immediately taken back to Oakland to answer to some charges against him there.

Ross Sechler, of Kime, Pa., spent part of last week with his son, Charles Sechler, of this place.

Rev. Alvin Yugel, of the Lutheran church, will deliver a special sermon and hold the final examination of his class of catechumens in the church at this place on Good Friday at 7 p. m.

Sunday School was organized here last Sunday morning with O. C. Buckle as superintendent, Mrs. J. B. Emory as assistant and Miss Effie Bittinger as secretary. Sunday School will convene in its first session for the year on next Sunday morning at 9:30 o'clock.

Foster's Forecast.

In the great central valleys April temperature will average above normal from March 30th to April 14th and excellent crop weather will continue during those sixteen days. April 15th to 24th will be unusually cold making 10 days of bad crop weather, temperatures going uncomfortably close to the frost line in northern sections as the cold waves pass. Rising temperatures and better crop weather April 25 to May 2 with very little rainfall. Most severe storms will occur during the five days of which April 4th, 13th and 19th will be the central days. Heavy rains in Texas 9th to 18th. Drouth in central sections.—W. T. Foster.

Mr. George M. Brown, manager of the Mackey Lumber Company, spent Saturday evening in Oakland on business.

Mr. Floyd Duckworth, one of THE REPUBLICAN'S good friends from Bloomington District, spent yesterday in Oakland.

Mr. W. W. Savage, of Friendsville, was in Oakland Tuesday on court business, when he made this office a business visit.

Justice of the Peace A. S. Teats has moved his office from the Townshend building on Alder street to the Ravenscroft building.

Mr. William O. Davis and sister Miss Marguerite returned to Oakland Sunday night from a few days' visit to their parents in Frostburg.

Rev. L. B. Hensley returned to Oakland last Saturday from a visit to Mrs. Hensley, who is at Beverly, W. Va., for the benefit of her health.

Mr. Charles A. Ashby has sold his store at Clarksburg and will return to Deer Park where he will probably resume the mercantile business.

Messrs. C. F. Hammond, R. E. Sliger and Julius C. Renninger were in Terra Alta Thursday where they were initiated into the Chapter degrees of Masonry.

Mrs. E. Fundenburg and daughter Miss Tecla are now residents of Oakland having moved to Crook's Crest from their former home near Deer Park Monday of this week.

Mr. Victor Fairall, who recently sold his restaurant business to Mr. A. C. Whetsell, has been appointed Baltimore & Ohio agent at Swanton and has assumed his new duties.

Mrs. E. J. Frantz and daughter, Mrs. John J. Sweeney, who were guests for two weeks of relatives in and near Selbysport, returned to their homes in Oakland last Saturday night.

Messrs. Lloyd Broadwater and Jonas Weitzell, of Garrett county, were called to Baltimore on Monday owing to the serious illness of Mrs. Jonas Weitzell, who is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital.—Lonaconing Star.

Ex-Sheriff A. L. Lee, of Kitzmiller, spent Monday in Oakland as a witness before the Circuit Court, being accompanied by Mr. W. H Dellinger, manager of the Monroe Coal Company's mercantile stores at Dodson and Barnum.

LOST—Monday, March 15, on Hoopole road near the Brant farm, a fifteen-jewel Elgin movement watch; silverine open face case; attached was a Taft fob. Reward if returned to THE REPUBLICAN office.

Dr. Willis F. Manges, of Philadelphia, came to Oakland Sunday morning last and spent the day here with his parents, Rev. and Mrs. E. Manges, the latter having been quite ill for two weeks but is now somewhat improved.

County Treasurer W. E. Hollinger, of Guard, spent Tuesday and yesterday in Oakland on business. Mr. Hollinger and Sheriff Austin Brown recently purchased a large tract of timber land near Avilton which they will operate during the coming summer, the timber being principally hemlock.

St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran Sunday school last Sunday morning was addressed by Mr. Scott T. Jones, his subject being "Temperance," which was also the subject of the lesson that day. Mr. Jones' remarks were practical and scholarly and were listened to with much interest by those present.

Mr. John Harned, who went from Oakland to New York early in the fall and from that city to Davenport, Iowa, arrived in Terra Alta from the latter place last Saturday evening and will come to Oakland in a few days. Mr. Harned reports having spent a pleasant winter in the west and greatly improved in health.

A large number of the parents attended a special meeting for parents conducted under the auspices of the Junior Epworth League in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland yesterday afternoon at 4.15 o'clock. In addition to the presence of the fathers and mothers the Sunday school officers and teachers were in attendance and a profitable hour was spent.

Mr. M. R. Frantz, recently of Crellin, who has been in the employ of the Fairmont Coal Company for a number of years, with which corporation he holds a very responsible position, was in Oakland last Saturday calling on his old friends. Mr. Frantz recently returned from a six weeks' visit to Hot Springs, Arkansas, where he went for treatment for rheumatism with which he suffered some time, but is now very much improved.

Mr. Thos. J. Peddicord addressed the men's meeting in the Parish house, Westernport, last Sunday afternoon, the subject being "The Book of Books." Notwithstanding the Eagles memorial services in the Opera House the attendance was good. Next Sunday the Hon. George L. Wellington will address the meeting on "The Church and Citizenship." Mr. Wellington's well known ability as an orator should, and no doubt will, cause a large attendance.—Piedmont Herald.

The public schools of this county will close on Friday of this week after a term of seven and one-half months. In some sections of the county the schools have made excellent progress, especially in the towns. This is true in every respect in regard to the Oakland schools. In every department progress has been made, notwithstanding the crowded condition of the several rooms. Prof. Palmer and his assistants deserve all the credit for the upward trend of events in connection with the Oakland school. As principal he has been painstaking and energetic and has imparted knowledge to the pupils in every department with clearness and understanding.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Mr. W. W. Savage, of Friendsville, Announces His Candidacy.

As will be noticed by reference to the head of the editorial page in this paper today, Mr. Walter W. Savage, of Friendsville, makes an announcement of his candidacy for the nomination for House of Delegates by the Republican party.

Mr. Savage has been an almost lifelong resident of the town in which he at present resides and where he is actively and successfully engaged in the general mercantile business. In addition to this interest he is also connected with varied other enterprises in his home town, being on the board of directors of the First National Bank of Friendsville, which is a thriving and successful financial institution; president of the Friendsville Milling Company and a member of the firm of S. Savage & Son, undertakers. Mr. Savage's church connection is with the Methodist Episcopal denomination, being a consistent member of the church at Friendsville. He is happily married and is the father of five interesting children. The only public office he has heretofore held was that of the Mayoralty of Friendsville, being the municipality's first executive officer under its charter. This position he successfully filled and was urged to accept a second term but declined.

In connection with his candidacy he will make an honest endeavor to be successful and requests his friends throughout the county to support him.

Messrs Ralph T. Ashby and son have formed a partnership for the purpose of embarking in the general mercantile business at Crellin where they own a desirable lot and buildings suitable for the business. The store will be opened shortly with the junior member of the firm in charge. A general line of goods will be carried.

Mr. Joel Yutzy, of Somerset county, Pa., in company with Mr. Norman Wilhelm, of Sand Patch, spent Tuesday and yesterday in Oakland on business with the Board of School Commissioners. Mr. Yutzy's previous visit to Oakland was made forty-two years ago when he and his five brothers rode through the country horseback and paid their relative, the late Jacob Yutzy, at Sunny side, a visit of a few days. At the time Oakland was a hamlet of a few houses and the country roundabout a wilderness to a great extent. Mr. Wilhelm is a native Garrett countian being a son of Mr. Aaron Wilhelm, and moved to Pennsylvania from District No. 9 a few years ago.

For the first time within the memory of Oakland's most ancient citizens the present winter has been the most remarkable, in one instance at least, that being the utter failure of the ice crop. Heretofore ice has been harvested in great quantities from the streams, ponds and lakes in and about town, but this season not one of the more than twenty-five or thirty ice houses in Oakland has been filled or even partly so, the result being that the consumers of ice will have to depend on the manufactured article the coming summer. To meet this emergency contracts have already been made by one or two consumers with out-of-town manufacturers. Mr. Henry Lauer, of the Oakland Bakery, has received the first of five car loads contracted for by him. The shipment is being stored in the Frantz Hotel house and additional houses will be secured by Mr. Lauer to accommodate later consignments.

In Memoriam.

After a long and severe illness Bro. Eugene G. Wilson was called to the Hunting Grounds of the Great Spirit, and it has cast a shadow of gloom over the entire membership of the Youghiogheny Tribe No. 151.

We can scarcely realize that this genial soul, this friend of man, will meet with us no more; that his work is finished, and all that is left is a pleasant memory.

We have trailed through many great Suns with his bright companionship to cheer us; we have basked in the sunshine of his smiles, we have partaken of his generous hospitality and feel more keenly than words can express the loss we have sustained.

To his sorrowing family we extend our sympathy and trust that Kishe Manitou will lighten with the softening touch of time the bereavement that has fallen so heavily upon them. We as Red Men realize that human life is but the trail that leads to the grave; death the final goal to which we must come—sure, certain and inevitable!

He who was the ornament of our fraternity, is dead; those who would find him must seek him in his grave.

Bro. Wilson in life was a monument of genial joy and sunshine—a companionable, whole-soul Brother; but in death is still and lifeless—his soul has taken its flight to the Happy Hunting Grounds in the twinkle of an eye; in a flash of lightning he is gone to that bourne whence no traveler has ever returned. We mourn for him, we weep for him, we long for him; but he is not here. We shall hear his voice no longer, we shall touch his hand in friendship no more.

Youghiogheny Tribe No. 151, Improved Order of Red Men has lost a well-tried, whole-souled, magnanimous brother, and we now pay this our last tribute in memory to his name.

JOHN D. HAYDEN,
C. F. DAWSON,
W. C. READY,
Committee.

Resolutions of Respect.

WHEREAS, Almighty God has in His wise Providence seen fit to again sever and call from our midst in his mature manhood our esteemed brother, Eugene G. Wilson, and

WHEREAS, Our association with him has caused us to love and respect him and realizing the zeal and faithfulness with which he exemplified the principles of friendship, charity and benevolence, therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Wilson Garrett Lodge No. 113, K. of P., has sustained an irreparable loss. We shall miss his genial fraternal associations and timely council in the lodge room.

Resolved, That we tender to the bereaved widow and children our profound sympathy in this their great affliction.

Resolved, That while we deplore the loss of our brother and realizing that this community will miss his active participation in the affairs of life, and that in him the family has lost the kind admonitions of an indulgent husband and parent, yet we bow in humble submission to the decree of Him who doeth all things well, not forgetting that solemn admonition "That all who are born must die."

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon our minutes and a copy be sent to the family of our deceased brother, also a copy be sent to the local newspapers.

Respectfully submitted in F., C. and B.

A. G. ROSS,
LUTHER BROWN,
FRED. J. SCHROEDER,
Committee.

Resolutions of Respect.

WHEREAS, We as members of Oak Lodge No. 8, I. O. O. F., feel deeply the loss of Eugene G. Wilson, a member who was faithful in all things. He was one of nature's true noblemen; brave and generous, true and kind, a good citizen, a representative Odd Fellow, a kind husband and father and a generous friend of humanity has laid down life's burdens. His life and labors are an example for the rising generation, for they show what honest industry, integrity and fealty to duty may accomplish when coupled with courage and ability. No clouds darken the clear sky of his career; honest, faithful, steadfast, pure, he had so lived that when the summons came, he approached his grave "like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him," and lie down to pleasant dreams; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we as members of Oak Lodge No. 8, do truly and earnestly regret and mourn the loss of such a brother and friend.

Resolved, That as brothers we calmly submit to Him, who has said it is appointed unto all men once to die:

By Thy hands the boon is given,
Thou hast taken but Thine own,
Lord of earth and God of Heaven,
Evermore Thy will be done.

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved family, loved ones and friends our deepest sympathy, and commend them to Him who is able to keep that which we commit unto Him until that Great Day, and who led our deceased brother to final victory in Heaven.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the shipwreck of the steamer on which Miss Genevieve Leslie, an American heiress, Lord Winthrope, an Englishman, and Tom Blake, a brusque American, were passengers. The three were tossed upon an uninhabited island and were the only ones not drowned. Blake recovered from a drunken stupor.

CHAPTER II.—Blake, shunned on the boat, because of his roughness, became a hero as preservers of the helpless pair. The Englishman was suing for the hand of Miss Leslie. Blake started to swim back to the ship to recover what was left.

CHAPTER III.—Blake returned safely. Winthrope wasted his last match on a cigarette, for which he was scored by Blake. Their first meal was a dead fish.

CHAPTER IV.—The trio started a ten mile hike for higher land. Thirst attacked them. Blake was compelled to carry Miss Leslie on account of weariness. He taunted Winthrope.

CHAPTER V.—They entered the jungle. That night was passed roosting high in a tree.

CHAPTER VI.—The next morning they descended to the open again. All three constructed hats to shield themselves from the sun. They then feasted on cocoanuts, the only procurable food. Miss Leslie showed a liking for Blake, but detested his roughness.

CHAPTER VII.—Led by Blake they established a home in some cliffs. Blake found a fresh water spring.

CHAPTER VIII.—Miss Leslie faced an unpleasant situation. They planned their campaign.

CHAPTER IX.—Blake recovered his surveyor's magnifying glass, thus insuring fire. He started a jungle fire, killing a large leopard and smothering several cubs.

CHAPTER X.—In the leopard's cavern they built a small home. They gained the cliffs by burning the bottom of a tree until it fell against the heights.

CHAPTER XI.—The trio secured eggs from the cliffs. Miss Leslie's white skirt was decided upon as a signal.

CHAPTER XII.—Miss Leslie made a dress from the leopard skin. Blake's efforts to kill antelopes failed.

CHAPTER XIII.—Overhearing a conversation between Blake and Winthrope, Miss Leslie became frightened.

CHAPTER XIV.—Blake was poisoned by a fish. Jackals attacked the camp that night, but were driven off by Genevieve. Blake returned, after nearly dying.

CHAPTER XV.—Blake constructed an animal trap. It killed a hyena.

CHAPTER XVI.—On a tour the trio discovered honey and oysters.

CHAPTER XVII.—Miss Leslie was attacked by a poisonous snake. Blake killed it and saved its poison to kill game.

CHAPTER XVIII.—For the second time Winthrope was attacked by fever. He and Blake disagreed.

CHAPTER XIX.—Blake made a strong door for the private compartment of Miss Leslie's cave-home. A terrible storm raged that night. Winthrope stole into her room, but she managed to swing her door closed in time.

CHAPTER XX.—Winthrope, badly hurt, died the following morning.

CHAPTER XXI.—The storm tore down their distress flag, so a new one was swung from the bamboo pole.

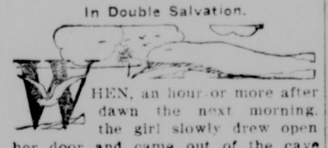
CHAPTER XXII.—Miss Leslie helped in covering Winthrope's grave with stones.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Genevieve took a strong liking to Blake.

CHAPTER XXIV.—On exploration tour they were attacked by a lion. Blake, by great exhibition of courage, repelled the beast. He then set fire to the woods. Miss Leslie told herself she had fallen in love with him.

CHAPTER XXV.

In Double Salvation.



WHEN, an hour or more after dawn the next morning, the girl slowly drew open her door and came out of the cave Blake was nowhere in sight. She sighed, vastly relieved, and hastened across to bathe her flushed face in the spring. Stopping every few moments to listen for his step down the cleft she gathered up a hamper of food and fled to the tree-ladder.

As she drew herself up on the cliff she noticed a thin column of smoke rising from the last smouldering brands of a beacon fire that had been built in the midst of the bird colony on the extreme outer edge of the headland. She did not, however, observe that, while the smoke column streamed up from the fire directly skyward beyond it there was a much larger volume of smoke, which seemed to have eddied down the cliff face and was now rolling up into view from out over the sea. She gave no heed to this, for the sight of the beacon had instantly alarmed her with the possibility that Blake was still on the headland, and would imagine that she was seeking him.

She paused, her cheeks aflame. But the only sign of Blake that she could see was the fire itself. She reflected that he might very well have left before dawn. As likely as not he had descended at the north end of the cleft and had gone off to the river to start his catamaran. At the thought all the color ebbed from her cheeks and left her white and trembling. Again she stood hesitating. With a sigh she started on toward the signal staff.

She was close upon the border of the bird colony when Blake sat up and she found herself staring into his blinking eyes.

"Hello!" he mumbled, drowsily. He sprang up wide awake, and flushing with the guilty consciousness of what he had done. "Look at the sun—way up! Didn't mean to oversleep, Miss Leslie. You see I was up pretty late tending the beacon. But of course that's no excuse—"

"Don't!" she exclaimed. There were tears in her eyes; yet she smiled as she spoke. "I know what you mean by 'pretty late.' You've been up all night."

"No, I haven't. Not all night—"

"To be sure! I quite understand, Mr. Thomas Blake! Now sit down and eat this luncheon."

"Can't. Haven't time. I've got to get to the river and set to work. I'll get some jerked beef and eat it on the way. You see—"

"Tom!" she protested.

"It's for you," he rejoined, and his lips closed together resolutely.

He was stepping past her, when over the seaward edge of the cliff there came a sound like the yell of a raging sea monster.

"Siren!" shouted Blake, whirling about.

The cloud of smoke beyond the cliff end was now rolling up more to the left. He dashed away towards the north edge of the cliff as though he intended to leap off into space. The girl ran after him as fast as she could over the loose stones. Before she had covered half the distance she saw him halt on the very brink of the cliff and begin to wave and shout like a madman. A few steps farther on she caught sight of the steamer. It was lying close in, only a little way off the north point of the headland.

Even as she saw the vessel, its siren responded to Blake's wild gestures with a series of joyous screams. There could be no mistake. He had been seen. Already they were letting go anchor, and there was a little crowd of men gathering about one of the boats. Blake turned and started on a run for the cliff. But Miss Leslie darted before him, compelling him to halt.

"Wait!" she cried, her eyes sparkling with happy tears. "Tom, it's come now. You needn't—"

"Let me by! I'm going to meet them. I want to—"

But she put her hands upon his shoulders.

"Tom!" she whispered. "let it be now, before any one—anything can possibly come between us! Let it be a part of our life here—here, where

"The Man I Love!"

I've learned how brave and true a real man can be!"

"And then have him prove himself a sneak!" he cried. "No; I won't, Jenny! I've got you to think of. Wait till I've seen your father. Ten to one he'll not hear of it—he'll cut you off without a cent. Not but what I'd be glad myself; but you're used to luxuries, girlie, and I'm a poor man I can't give them to you—"

She laid a hand on his mouth and smiled up at him in tender mockery.

"Come, now, Mr. Blake; you're not very complimentary. After surviving my cooking all these weeks, don't you think I might do, at a pinch, for a poor man's wife?"

"No, Jenny!" he protested, trying to draw back. "You oughtn't to decide now. When you get back among your friends things may look different. Think of your society friends! Wait till you see me with other men—gentlemen', I'm just a rough, uncultured, ordinary—"

"Hush!" she cried, and she again placed her hand on his mouth. "You sha'n't say such cruel things about Tom—my Tom—the man I trust—that I—"

Her arms slipped about his neck and her eyes shone up into his with tender radiance.

"Don't!" he begged, hoarsely. "'Tain't fair I—I can't stand it!"

"The man I love!" she whispered.

He crushed her to him in his great arms.

"My little girl!—dear little girl!" he repeated, and he pressed his lips to her hair.

She snuggled her face closer against his shoulder and replied in a very small voice: "I—I suppose you know that ship captains can m-marry people."

"But I haven't even a job yet!" he exclaimed. "Suppose your father—"

"Please listen!" she pleaded. There was a sound like suppressed sobbing.

"What is it?" he ventured, and he listened, greatly perturbed. The muffled voice sounded very meek and plaintive: "I'll try to do my part, Mr. Blake—really I will! I—I hope we can manage to struggle along—somehow. You know, I have a little of my own. It's only three—three million; but—"

"What!" he demanded, and he held her out at arm's length, to stare at her in frowning bewilderment. "If I'd known that, I'd—"

"You'd never have given me a chance to—to propose to you, you dear old silly!" she cried, her eyes dancing with tender mirth. "See here!"

She turned from him, and back again, and held up a withered, crumpled flower. He looked, and saw that it was the amaryllis blossom.

"You—kept it!"

"Because — because, even then, then, down in the bottom of my heart, I had begun to realize—to know what you were like—and of course that meant— Tom, tell me! Do you think I'm utterly shameless? Do you blame me for being the one to—to—"

"Blame you!" he cried. He paused to put a finger under her chin and raise her down-bent face. His eyes were very blue, but there was a twinkle in their depths. "Oh, yes; it was dreadful, wasn't it? But I guess I've no complaint to file just now."

THE END.

SOME OF LINCOLN'S EPIGRAMS

Sapient Sayings by the Immortal War Time Chief Executive.

Never be sorry for what you don't write; it is the things you do write that you are usually sorry for.

I have changed my mind. I don't think much of the man who is not wiser today than he was yesterday.

By a course of reasoning Euclid proves that all the angles in a triangle are equal to two right angles. Now if you undertook to disprove that proposition would you prove it false by calling Euclid a liar.

What do you think of those fellows in Wall street who are gambling in gold at such a time as this? For my part I wish every one of them had his devilish head shot off.—(Said to be Lincoln's harshest utterance.)

Whatever change may occur in the quantity of money in any community, time will adjust the derangement produced; but while the adjustment is progressing all suffer more or less and very many lose everything that renders life desirable. And no duty is more imperative on the government than that of furnishing the people a sound and uniform currency.

Ere long the most valuable of all arts will be the art of deriving a comfortable subsistence from the smallest area of soil.

All should share the privileges of government who assists in bearing its burdens; consequently, I would admit all whites to the right of suffrage who pay taxes or bear arms, by no means excluding females.

To secure to each laborer the whole product of his labor, or as nearly as possible, is a worthy object of any government. With some men liberty means for each man to do as he pleases with himself and the product of his labor; with others it means to do as they please with other men and the product of other men's labors. That issue will continue in this country when my poor tongue shall be silent. It is the eternal struggle between right and wrong, the common right of humanity and the divine right of kings. In whatever shape it develops itself it is the same tyranical spirit that says: "You toil and work and earn bread and I'll eat it."

No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them, till all of liberty shall be lost.

Our government rests on public opinion. Whoever can change public opinion can change the government practically just so much.

There is no grievance that is a fit object of redress by mob law. Among free men there can be no appeal from the ballot to the bullet, and they who take such appeal are sure to lose their case and pay costs.

Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself.

The one great living principle of all democratic government is that the representative is bound to carry out the known will of his constituents.

A free people in time of peace and quiet, when pressed by no common danger, naturally divide into parties. At such times the man who is for neither party is not, can not be of any consequence.

The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust in the best way all our difficulties.

Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it.

STUDYING THE HUMAN HEART

Possible Now With Scientific Equipment to See the Cardiac Organ.

The human heart is fast losing its mystery. You can actually see it nowadays—or rather, you can observe its movements in a shadow pictures by means of the Roentgen rays. The fact is not new, but the facilities for applying the idea to medical science have developed wonderfully, and the authority of one of the greatest English hospitals are proud of the latest addition to their electrical department, which will be opened probably in the near future. It is called an "orthodiagraph," because it gives a tracing of the object disclosed in exact relative dimensions.

The apparatus has four arms, one of which holds a small circular, greenish-yellow screen, one a a wide black ring, one a wooden case, and the other the little reservoir that acts as a pencil for the tracing. Against a tall canvas screen in the dark stands the person who wants his internal organs to be seen at work. The arms of the machine are lowered until the greenish-yellow screen appears in front. There is heard the faint crackle of electricity, a circle of light appears, and the motions of the heart, reflected on the screen may be followed. Attached to the front of the machine is a bulb. This is in association with the "pencil" behind, and as it is pressed a drawing of the heart is traced in little blue dots upon another white screen at the back.

The novelty of this machine is the perfection to which it has been brought. It may be worked by a finger.

Great value is attached to the use of the orthodiagraph, which will enable accurate and reliable records of the state of patients hearts to be obtained. At present however, only the outlines and the movements can be observed. It is not possible as yet to see the structure of the heart. The orthodiagraph was made at Nauheim, Germany.

SCHOOL INSPIRED BY LINCOLN

Scope of the University at Cumberland Gap for Poor Boys and Girls.

An endowment fund of half a million dollars is required to put Lincoln Memorial university at Cumberland Gap, Tenn., abreast of its opportunities. Princely gifts have already been bestowed upon the enterprise by many wealthy people of the country. The institution is for the benefit of the poor, primarily the poor of east Tennessee, whom Lincoln loved so well.

To teach young men and women not only to know but to do things is the fundamental idea of the Lincoln Memorial university. In their endeavors to obtain the necessary endowment fund those in charge of the movement say at the outset that it is not their intention to build up an institution on the plan of Harvard, Yale, the University of Virginia or Columbia. The curriculum of the university at Cumberland Gap includes all the various courses and trades as well. The general divisions of the institution at the present time are the normal, industrial, academic and the medical. They embrace domestic science, commercial training, music, printing, mechanical engineering, elocution, art, preparatory, collegiate, medicine and trained nursing. With the aid of the endowment fund it is the intention to install departments of all the trade schools.

The school is located in the Cumberland mountains and is for the benefit of the young men and women who want education, but who are unable to pay what is charged by the greater institutions of the country. Cumberland Gap is a part of that section known as Appalachian America, in which there is a population of over five millions of people. The young men and women of that section are too poor to pay traveling expenses to any great university even if the tuition at such institutions were offered free. To give such young men and women the opportunity of becoming better citizens and thereby benefit the country is the object of the Lincoln centennial endowment committee and at the same time to establish a national memorial to Abraham Lincoln.

The first steps toward establishing of this work were made in 1897. One of the prime movers in the enterprise was General O. O. Howard, who had the inspiration of Lincoln for a start. The great emancipator was interested in the welfare of the people of eastern Tennessee in 1863. He urged General Howard at that time to interest himself in their behalf, for they had helped Lincoln in his work. When the war was over General Howard and a few others undertook to carry out on a larger scale than Lincoln foresaw a movement which has already borne fruit. A charter was obtained giving authority to organize a board of directors and different departments. The board purchased the present property subject to heavy mortgages, and, finally, with the kindness of Mr. Carnegie, the last money—$2,300—was given and the mortgages were discharged.

At the start the university had nearly 200 students. Now it has 600, and many come and are turned away because the institution has no means properly to care for them. A small tuition is charged. Students come many miles afoot, often destitute, but pleading for a chance to earn their education by working on the farm of the institution or in some of its shops. The expenses for a term of twelve weeks, from tuition fee to board, ranges from $32.75 to $45.50.

If a student, boy or girl, goes to the institution penniless and is willing to help himself or herself in doing work about the farm or in the shops the institution so far as it may be able advances the necessary money and takes the student's note for the amount. This note is never collected except on honor. After the student has finished his or her course and goes out into the world he or she may pay back to the university the advance, without interest, and then it is advanced to some other student who is unable to pay. It is the experience of the officers of the school that nearly all students who have been helped in this manner never forget it and that they take pride in paying back the money advanced.

The story following, told by Dr. William L. Stooktbury, president of the institution, illustrates its scope and possibilities: "A young man came into my room," said the president, "carrying an old fashioned carpetbag. In his honest way he said, 'I've come to go to school, and I ain't got no money hardly.' I asked him is he had written before coming. He said he had not; that he had just made up his mind he wanted to go to school and walked thirty-five miles through the snows of the mountains. We had little in the way of bedding at the time, for we were well filled with students. I skirmished around, and, with the assistance of my wife, we secured one quilt. He took it to the dormitory near by, and for some time that constituted all the bedding he had. We were not able to furnish him a pillow. He was very industrious and learned rapidly. He was willing to do what he was asked. I wrote about his case to to a lady in New York, and she sent me $25 to help the boy through for a year. The boy worked in the shops or on the farm half of the day and went to school the other half. At the close of the term he had advanced rapidly and had paid all his expenses. He went home to the mountains of Kentucky. Soon after he taught in a public school for four months. Then he came back to us and took another course. He now holds a responsible position with the Louisville and Nashville railroad in his native state."

Another student became interested in one of the products of the university farm. That product was manufactured into a useful article. The institution put the article on the market. The student went on the road and solicited orders. In this way he paid back the money that had been advanced in his case. His experience in taking orders secured for him another place, and he is now a full fledged traveling salesman.

The university possesses 600 acres of ground, and near the center is the campus. The latter comprises walks and drives and is shaded by native and imported trees. The principal buildings is Grant-Lee hall, used largely for industrial work as well as for boys' dormitory; Avery hall, the gift of Samuel P. and Mrs. Avery of New York, used as a girls' dormitory; Ellen M. Myers hall, holding the primary, normal and academic classes, the chemical building for physics and the better instruction of the hygienic classes and the training of nurses; Arthur house, used as a conservatory of music which department is self supporting; several cottages (gifts of friends), to be used for teachers and to rent to mountain families whose children attend the university; the Carnegie library building with library and class rooms, and the new auditorium for chapel services and the large congregations.

Some of the buildings named were contracted and built by the students of the university. The Carnegie library building was built, furnished and decorated entirely by students. For the time put in on such work, or any other work in connection with the institution, students are paid. This is one of the features of the Lincoln Memorial university, and it will appeal to young men and women who are hungering for education, whose means will not permit them to attend more pretentious schools. The scheme of institution has been indorsed by educators connected with other universities and by United States Senators and representatives in congress and by the clergy of nearly all denominations.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

Hunting the Elephant

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

"A WILD bull elephant is the noblest work of God," recently said a well known African hunter to the writer.

Undoubtedly the sight of him lunging through a tropical forest, trunk upraised, tusks glistening, eyes gleaming, legs like monoliths crushing all opposition, is more than enough to fill with awe akin to fear the soul of a mere human, no matter how steely his nerves, how true his rifle or how clear his conscience.

That Mr. Roosevelt should not be satisfied with the dangers of lion, hippopotamus and rhinoceros killing and desires to add to them the unquestioned perils of elephant tracking is cumulative proof of his ambition to experience every possible thrill that this little world affords. His chosen hunting field on the Uganda tableland affords probably the best elephant territory now remaining in all Africa. Remote from the coast, infrequently touched even on its edges by whites, growing luxuriantly the pachyderm's best liked foods, well watered and well shaded, central Uganda was apparently created by the gods of the elephant as the ideal breeding place and playground of their favorite children.

African elephant hunting is more hazardous than that of India, where the venturers have trained elephants, on the backs of which large baskets or howdahs are placed to carry the riflemen comparatively out of harm's way. But no such trained pachyderms are had in Africa, and the tracking and attacking must be done on foot, an operation said by the renowned authority, Sir Samuel Baker, to be the most dangerous sport on earth, for, since many elephants are killed without any danger on foot, it is absolutely inevitable that the charge of a wounded animal will sooner or later have to be met successfully by the man who presses closely into combat with him—met successfully if the hunter would preserve his life from this unsought combat that calls forth every ounce of unswerving, unhesitating, intuitive courage. Like the hunter of the jungle lion, the slayer of the tusked behemoth has thrown his life in the balance, and if the balance swings against him only he himself is to blame.

Another way of hunting the beasts in a safe way, unknown in Africa, is the Indian custom of organizing immense drives with from 300 to 500 men, encircling a herd of elephants and forcing it by noise and other demonstrations to enter a large, specially prepared inclosure, termed a kraal. There the tuskers can readily be killed, or the beasts can be taken out individually and trained to the various kinds of work they are capable of performing. While it is true that elephant drives somewhat similar in nature are at times resorted to in Africa, they are conducted on much smaller scales, and the beasts are driven in front of the hunters who kill them instead of into inclosures.

In elephant shooting it is vitally important that the hunter have a detailed knowledge of the makeup of the brain of the beast, as the shots best calculated to instantly bring down the animal are those that penetrate the brain, and this, of course, cannot be penetrated unless a man knows just how it is situated inside the skull.

When a herd takes alarm at a party of attackers and starts on a rampage across country the hunters must travel at a punishing rate if they desire to secure any of the specimens, and woe be unto whatever is in the path of the crashing monsters. Obstructing trees, torn up by the roots, are thrown aside like so much driftwood on an ocean shore, and they will go fifty miles at a stretch over country of a nature that men would cover only twenty miles in the same period. Frequently elephants of the same herd become angered at each other and indulge in forest duels that would make a bullfight look like a kissing bee down on the old farm. The English authority, G. P. Sanderson, actually witnessed such an engagement and describes it and the subsequent hunt as follows:

"The elephants were separated from us by a deep ravine, and we saw them lunge ferociously at each other, cutting deep gashes with their sharp tusks. The cane tops bowed and trees shook as they bore each other backward and forward. The noise was terrific, when the beast nearest us, evidently having enough and losing large quantities of blood from his wounds, turned, uttered a deep roar of pain and fled across the ravine to near where we stood behind a clump of bushes. He began to destroy the foliage in sheer fury and grunted deeply. He was very large. It must have been a genuine monster that worsted him. Suddenly the animal backed away and stood stark still. Not a sound could be heard. He gazed straight in our direction, and I knew that he had winded us. His frenzy now sent his ears forward, his tail up, and straight at us he charged with incredible swiftness, considering his size. I stepped out into the open to clear my gun of the bushes and fired. I looked to see where the elephant lay.

"Good heavens! He had not even been checked. To my horror he was upon me. His tusks came through the smoke like the cowcatcher of a locomotive, and I had just time to fall flat before being impaled on them. His ponderous left foot came within a few inches of my left thigh, and I would have been crushed had I not drawn my legs forward as, shrieking shrilly, he rushed directly over me.

"My companion escaped by leaping into the ravine. The beast kept straight on and disappeared, leaving me soaked and my hair matted with the blood that flowed from his wounds."

When elephants lift each other one of their favorite things is to blow off each other's tail. Females, also especially fond of doing this to rival females in the same herd. Elephants roam about and feed both night and day and night, usually resting from 9 or 10 in the morning until the coolness of the afternoon. In warmest weather they bathe frequently and roll around in the mud. At such times they are shot comparatively easy. They are expert swimmers, going through the water with only the tips of their trunks or the tops of their heads showing above the surface. An elephant shot in the water floats while a hippopotamus sinks. The fastest rate at which African elephants have ever been known to travel is about fifteen miles an hour, the maximum length of their stride being from six and a half to seven feet.

Stalking one or two particular animals from a herd (the herds in Uganda number from ten to fifty members) is a task requiring consummate hunting skill. The herds travel with the females in front and the bulls in the rear, and herds are usually attacked from either the side or the rear. Solitary bulls, called "rogue" elephants, generally wildly vicious even before attacked, also present interesting problems. The natives have developed great aptitude in following and interpreting the footprints (spoor) of the quarry, whether lions, elephants, antelopes or other game. If it is old the edges have crumbled and they are filled, or partly so, with drift sand and bits of leaves. Wounded elephants are also tracked by the blood stains on the elephant grass through which they pass, and by the height of the stains on the grass it can be estimated how dangerous the wound is.

In "On Safari" Abel Chapman tells of an attack by a bull elephant that almost cost him his life. He says: "Archer and I approached to within thirty yards of the animal (near the shore of Lake Baringo, British East Africa) and hoped to get a good shot without detection beforehand. Suddenly the wind shifted, and the elephant caught our scent. Instantaneously he was all alert. Suddenly he disappeared in the jungle brake, and while trying to spy him a heavy crashing heard directly before us told us he was coming. At once a big square forehead appeared directly above us in the tall grass (ten or twelve feet high) only a few yards away, resembling the hoary gray tower of some old village church.

"I placed a 303 bullet in his temple at the point described by experts, 'halfway between the eye and the orifice of the ear,' though his ear was as big as a barn door. Archer, in front, tried the effective forehead shot, aiming at the base of the trunk. The beast swerved from sight under these blows, but quickly reappeared again just as I had reloaded. He crashed at us viciously from our right, and we each put bullets into his head from the side, his ear almost touching our rifle muzzles, Archer hitting him with a 40 and I with two more 303, following with two lead slugs from a 45 black powder rifle. But these total seven shots in vital parts had no apparent effect, and the beast headed into a heavy thorn jungle. We followed but for miles he outsped us, and we reluctantly gave up the chase, marveling that any animal could live, much less travel, so far and so fast with seven ordinarily deadly bullets in his skull. Our natives continued the pursuit twenty miles and gave up. Later the beast was found dead at a point about forty miles distant, his great tusks, weighing ninety pounds apiece, having been taken by a native ivory trader.

"This elephant was estimated to weigh almost 12,000 pounds, the greatest weight known being 14,000 pounds, and this latter animal stood practically twelve feet high, the record height for the modern pachyderm."

The elephant carcass is a choice prize for the natives. They climb upon its side and cut a large hole straight down into the interior, just as a mining shaft is sunk, and the natives climb down out of sight in the "shaft" to hunt about for choice morsels. A coating of elephant fat and blood is a popular substitute for clothing among certain Uganda savages, who believe that no people should wear clothes until after marriage.

Elephant hunters in Uganda find ant hills a valuable aid as observatories. These hills tower to a considerable height, and many of them can be easily climbed. Others rise sharply like smokestacks, and, being hollow, holes are frequently dug in their sides and fires built for cooking. A perfect draft is produced by the hollow interior, and the smoke is carried off at the top. So numerous are these hills that they are a distinctive, a typical, feature of the country. Cases are known where hunters have saved their lives from charging elephants by dodging behind convenient ant hills.

The charge of an aroused elephant herd is, by the way, a sight never to be forgotten if the object of it escapes with his life. A writer in the Geographical Magazine describes such an assault by African elephants near Lake Rudolph, as follows:

"We entered a patch of dense African jungle. Huge prickly aloes, enormous cactuses with long sharp points and a tall feathery plant like privet made up a safe asylum from ordinary mortals. Very few minutes sufficed to turn hunters into hunted. No. 1, a cow, charged down on us. Jumping aside, I killed her as she rushed on my gun carrier not four feet from him. Hardly had we struck the spoor of another lot when a young bull suddenly bore down on me. However, a lucky forehead shot laid him low. While skinning one of these heads the whole place seemed alive with elephants smashing toward us. Seizing my rifle, I ran ahead. Suddenly a line of over forty elephants broke cover, about twenty-five in the first line jammed together like a cavalry regiment charging. Being only twenty yards from me when they appeared, with the center bearing directly down on one, I own to feeling they had the best of me. I saw my only chance was killing the flank one. In a second I dropped the left hand one, which, falling inwardly, inclined the whole troop a little to the right. Within ten yards I fired my remaining barrel, dropping another, causing still further deflection to the right. Another second the flank one on the left rushed past, almost knocking me down.

"I felt thankful for such a lucky escape and blessed my new 450 cordite rifle, which had done such good work."

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

"The main purpose of the book of the Acts is to untold the broadening spirit and form of the church of God."—Theodore T. Munger, D. D. "This chapter (Acts 10) is parallel in importance with that which depicted the scenes of Penticost."—David O. Mears, D. D.

Cornelius was a centurion, corresponding to our captain, the head of a company of soldiers numbering 100 when full. This company was part of the cohort "called the Italian band," because made up of Romans born in Italy.

(1) He was "a devout man and one that feared God." The words have a technical sense," says McGiffert, and indicate that Cornelius worshiped the God of the Jews, but was not formally a proselyte. (2) He was a good husband and father, and led "all his house" in his own righteous ways. (3) He was liberal, and "gave much alms to the people." (4) He was not only outwardly devout, but inwardly pious, and "prayed to God always." In these secret prayers we may be sure, from the sequel, that he sought for a better knowledge of God and of God's will, for that is what was given him (v. 4). (5) Moreover (Acts 10: 22) Cornelius carried his religion into practical affairs, where he was just and fair dealing; and (6) as the result of it all, he was held in high honor by the Jews themselves (Acts 10: 22), as well as by the Gentiles. It would have been impossible to find a better man for God's purpose, or one who would have appealed more strongly to Peter.

"The sixth hour" (noon) was "a set time of devotion with pious Jews."—Geikie. Peter had retired from his comrades in toil, for perhaps he helped Simon in his tannery, and nowhere better than "upon the housetop" could he find privacy and quiet for prayer. The roofs of eastern houses are flat, and often surrounded with a parapet three or four feet high, which would screen Peter from observation as he knelt. He was "very hungry," for he "probably had not yet broken his fast."—Rackham. They were preparing food below, and perhaps the savor of it rose to the housetop, but before it was ready Peter "fell into a trance." The Greek word for trance is different from the word for Cornelius' vision. A vision is something seen outside one's self; a trance is the condition of one's mind, that sees inner visions. One is not asleep, and it is not a dream, but a peculiar exaltation of the spirit. In this trance Peter saw, let down from the sky, a great sheet, like "the wind-stretched canvas of the craft on the Lake of Galilee."—Lumby. It was full of animals, many of them the wild beasts and reptiles which the Jews considered unclean. Three times a mysterious voice bade Peter rise from his knees and slay and eat the shocking food, three times he refused in horror, three times he was bidden to make nothing unclean that God had cleansed by bidding him partake of it, and then the great sheet was lifted and disappeared in the sky.

The messengers from Cornelius "had made inquiry for Simon's house" (the Greek word implies a careful search through the streets), and while Peter was meditating on his vision, they were even then at the gate, and calling for him. Before word of his visitor could reach him, the Holy Spirit in some way made Peter conscious of their coming, and bade him go with them.

The outstretched sheet which Peter saw in his vision signified the whole world, and the four corners symbolized the directions, north, south, east and west, in which the gospel was to be carried. The contents of the sheet showed that all men were to be reached, the lowest races as well as the highest, savage and civilized, poor and rich, ignorant and wise. It was a perfect symbol of foreign missions.

From every nation on earth immigrants are pouring into the United States at the rate of more than a million a year. America is the modern equivalent of the sheet of Peter's vision, full of clean and unclean, men of all languages, beliefs, customs, helpful and hurtful, blessings and scourges. The work of home missions is to believe in all these, love them all, and win them all for Jesus Christ.

Peter obeyed promptly and gladly, taking one step toward fellowship with the Gentiles by entertaining the three messengers over night in Simon's house. The cause of this obedience: (1) The influence of his own vision, (2) coupled with that of Cornelius matching it with evident supernatural design, (3) together with the influence of the Holy Spirit upon his mind, and (4) the memory of Christ's prophecies of the world-wide spread of his church. The character of Cornelius, as reported by the messengers, helped him to a decision. Evidently, also, he consulted with friends.

COUNTRY ROADS.

They Should Be Improved So as to Leave a Walk Along the Side.

The neglected condition of our roads and the fact that we are not building them according to law, greatly assist the hard roads advocates iin their arguments for hard roads, writes an Illinois correspondent of the Prairie Farmer.

School children and other footmen are daily trespassing by going through the fields because there are no walks provided. Where the roads are 60 feet wide, no more provision is made for a walk than where they are reduced to 40 feet and the whole width is used up with the grades and ditches. We can't get to a neighbor when it is muddy without going through barb wires or hedges and yet some people wonder why some of our youngsters are so anxious to get to town.

These conditions prohibit women on foot from using the roads, whereas, if they were built according to law they could wheel their baby carriages to their neighbors' homes with satisfaction, even when the wagon track is muddy.

If this one condition were remedied, the fine made sufficient, and enough wardens provided to protect the walks from injury it would be a great movement toward improving our roads.

I think all of the grades, walks and the boundaries of the roads should be determined by competent engineers whose duty it shall be to mark the same with suitable stones wherever it is necessary.

The benefit and satisfaction derived from such improvements would greatly overbalace the small increase of our taxes in the country.

Should our lawmakers bring this subject before the legislature they would certainly be so well pleased with the support that they would get from the farmers that they would enact a law that would put the above provisions into effect.

A NOTABLE VICTORY.

Farmers of Wisconsin Help Secure Law for Building of Good Roads.

A notable victory was won in Wisconsin, largely by farmers, at the election in November. It was the adoption of the amendment to the state constitution authorizing state aid for the building of roads. The state constitution forbade the legislature to appropriate any money for internal improvements, but this state-aid amendment went through by a majority of 70,000. A great change was wrought in the sentiment of the farmers, says the Hoard's Dairyman, as soon as they came to see the following facts:

1. That up to the present time farm property has had to bear all the expense of making country roads.

2. That it is nothing more than fair that city, village and all other property in the state should bear a just share of the expense of making better roads.

3. That we never will have good roads as long as we continue in our present state.

The farmers saw the point and rose to the occasion.

ROAD ON HILLSIDE.

Plan of Construction to Prevent Washing Out of Roadbed.

To guard against washouts on a road that winds along a hillside, a judicious planting of shrubs is advisable. A gutter and drainage ditch on the lower side, with a slight embankment will make a highway almost as safe as if built on level ground.

Plan of Hillside Road.

MORE ABOUT ALFALFA.

The value of alfalfa is seen in some such facts as the following:

An acre in hay brings $25 to $35 a year according to yield, for feeding purposes.

There is always a good market for alfalfa hay, which yields more than double that of timothy.

Hogs, cows and sheep are fond of alfalfa grazing and pastures and they thrive greatly on it.

Land that will grow alfalfa luxuriantly is worth double that of land that will grow only timothy hay.

Four times cutting a year of alfalfa hay, which is usual on good land means five to seven tons per acre.

Alfalfa is not only great for live stock feeding, but as a legume gathers nitrogen from the air and greatly enriches the soil.

Great is alfalfa!

A Good Argument.

One of the best arguments in favor of pure-bred dairy stock is the fact that practically every inquirer wants registered bulls or registered cows. No one is advertising for grades or the product of scrub bulls. The demand for animals of good dairy breeding cannot be satisfied. The breeding of dairy stock offers a most excellent opportunity for the young man who desires to become a breeder. One beauty of breeding dairy stock is that the sale of butter-fat alone pays expenses and still yields a nice profit, and the sale of animals for breeding purposes is velvet.

DRESSES FOR GIRLS

TWO CHARMING ANKLE-LENGTH COSTUMES.

Cedar-Green Cashmere Makes Up into Extremely Pretty Garments—Sapphire-Blue Velveteen Recommended for the Second.

The sketch to the left shows a smart dress in cedar-green cashmere; the skirt has a group of small tucks on either side of the front of skirt, they are stitched down just over half-way. Silk to match is finely tucked for the yoke, and long cuffs, the upper part of sleeve is formed of a small puff of material, edged by a band of passementerie, which also edges the yoke; below the yoke on either side of front four tucks are made to correspond with those on skirt.

Materials required: Seven yards cashmere 48 inches wide, 2½ yards passementerie, 3 yards silk.

The sapphire-blue velveteen is employed for the pretty dress on the right. A band of passementerie trims the foot of skirt, otherwise it is quite plain. Tucked silk, in a much lighter blue, forms the cuff and yoke; strips and tabs of passementerie trim the yoke and are also taken round the armholes; other strips, only bound with silk, are taken over the shoulders and round the elbows.

Materials required: Nine yards velveteen, 3½ yards silk, 3½ yards passementerie.

WRAPS OF GREAT BEAUTY.

A Manteau of Pale Khaki-Colored Silk Lined with Flowered Satin.

Fancy a great mantle of ample folds, made of pale gray, thick satin, lined with black satin of the same marvelous softness—the lining covered with shirred black mousseline de soie, says a Paris letter to Vogue. This I saw thrown over a gown of pale, rose-colored crepe de chine trimmed with silver braid and silver tassels. The dense black of the lining against so much color and daintiness was wonderfully striking.

Of a fascinating novelty also was a manteau of thick, pale khaki-colored silk lined with white satin printed with pompadour flowers. Straight breadths composed it, laid over the shoulders in set plaits, each one held by a large jeweled button. Plaits continued from the shoulders shaping sleeves that tapered small at the wrists, the buttons following the line. Daintily elegant was a manteau of oddly-draping folds of white liberty satin over a fourreau of coarse tulle all embroidered in green, gold and silver threads. The folds looped from the front, passing under the arms to the back, waist high, finishing in a huge ribbon bow; from the bow a band of embroidery slanted higher, to the front, where it was held under two large buttons. The huge cape that shaped her hood was covered with shirrings of rose-colored silk; and very pretty wide lace frills shaded the face.

A Clever Idea.

It has seemed so impossible to keep portieres closed in winter that almost every one has become reconciled to the fact and lets the draft sweep through the room at will. But a clever woman has at last found a solution to the problem, and such a simple device it is. There seems no excuse for its not having been used long ago.

The curtains may be fastened together with patent clasps, of course, just like tailored gloves are fastened, or skirts. Why not? The arrangement is almost invisible, and would never be discovered were the little bails and sockets sewn to the wrong side of a thick curtain. They are easy to undo and easy to refasten, and the discovery may fill many a long-felt want in houses where the living room and dining room are separated only by portieres.

Taking Out Grease Spots.

One of the most dreaded results of an attempt to take a spot out of a dress is the rim of discoloration which it so often leaves.

In removing a grease spot, to prevent the oil from running into the fabric beyond the blemish, make a rim of French chalk around it and put a piece of blotting paper under it. Then wet a cloth with chloroform if the color is delicate, and rub gently toward the center of the spot. Change the cloth as fast as it becomes soiled, and finally, when the spot has disappeared, wipe dry with a clean cloth. The more volatile the fluid being used in cleaning the less it will affect the color on which it is used. Chloroform being the most volatile is the safest. If another cleaning fluid has been used and a ring remains, use chloroform on it and it will be likely to disappear.

HEAD LETTUCE FROM HOTBEDS.

Now Is the Time to Begin to Plan for Early Vegetables.

Plants were started about March 1 in an ordinary hotbed and were well aired to get hardy plants. The hotbed into which they were transplanted was made the last week in March, making a bed of hot manure eight feet wide and 18 inches deep on top of the ground. Frames were made as for ordinary cold frames, except that they were deeper, 18 inches back and ten inches front.

These frames were set on the manure. After it had settled well and had been trampled evenly, five inches of rich soil was put in, which was covered with about one inch of rotted sheep manure and thoroughly mixed with the soil. The bed was then marked so plants would stand eight inches apart each way, putting in about 40 plants to the sash.

Our sashes are made three by six feet, using two by two-inch stuff, with a crossbar of the same in the middle. Common sheeting, costing eight cents per yard, was tacked onto this frame with large-headed tacks. Plants were set the last day of March, and it seemed as if to test the value of the plan a cold snap came; on the morning of April 2 the thermometer stood at 16 degrees above zero. Cabbage and cauliflower plants set in a well-protected cold frame were frozen badly, while this bed, with only a slight protection of wild hay, came through without a bit of frost.

The sashes were removed every day, unless it snowed or the thermometer stood below 40 degrees, but were covered every night when there was danger of frost, writes the correspondent in Orange Judd Farmer. A row of Scarlet Globe radishes was sown between each row and were sold at a good profit ten days before we could pull from outdoors. A few sashes were planted to Grand Rapids lettuce, which was ready to cut May 20, while plants set outdoors were not ready until two weeks later.

We began setting head lettuce June 1, which was 13 days earlier than from outdoors, where fine, large heads were set. The lettuce from the sashes brought us 60 cents per dozen wholesale and from seven to ten cents per head from the wagon. On our retail route it brought about two dollars per sash, beside the radishes, which brought one dollar per sash on an average.

April and May were cold and wet here, so that with an average season and by using large, strong plants, I think we could have had heads by May 20. Nearly every plant made a good, hard, well-developed head. The varieties were May King, Big Boston and Naumberger, a new variety which proved better than May King, both in the sashes and outside. It made a larger, more solid head that stood longer after it was ready to cut than May King, and just as early.

SPLIT TREES.

How They May Be Treated and Preserved.

A kind friend contributes a method for saving trees that split or threaten to split at crotches. The drawings show the idea clearly, says Farm Journal. Any blacksmith can make a brace of this kind, the desired length, at small expense. Bore a small hole, as indicated by the dotted line, insert the rod, tighten and adjust the attachments—and there you are! Surely valuable trees are worth this little attention when it is needed.

Plan of Saving Split Trees.

Castor Beans.

Castor beans are remarkably striking plants for the annual garden. They give a rugged tropical effect when planted in clumps or with rank growing annuals and perennials, such as cannas and elephants ear. They should occupy the center or back of the bed unless they are dwarf varieties. In a single season they often grow more than ten feet tall. For extra large plants the seeds should be sown in pots in a greenhouse, hotbed or window when tomato plants are started. But large plants will grow from seed sown in the open ground when the weather has become settled. A dry situation in deep and rich soil is best. Among the most striking varieties are Ricinus Zanzibariensis and R. Borbonensis, which reach a height of 12 to 15 feet, and R. Cambodgensis, which grows only about six feet tall but has beautiful, bronzy foliage.

Low-Headed Trees.

Keep your trees headed down so that they will not reach up to the moon. We have seen old apple trees that were certainly 30 feet tall. It is as much as a man's life is worth to pick fruit on such trees.

Caught Live Fox with Coat.

Catching a fox alive with an overcoat is a feat performed by David Clinard, a member of the Fox Hunt club of Winston Salem, N. C. After a long and exciting chase Mr. Clinard with six hounds had tired Reynard out, and in doubling the fox came so near Mr. Clinard that he threw his long overcoat over the animal and succeeded in capturing it just before the dogs arrived.—Fur News.

Test for Drinking Water.

To ascertain if water is free from organic pollution, place a lump of sugar in a bottle nearly full and cork up. If, after thus excluding the air and keeping the bottle in the light for two or three days, no milky cloud is apparent, but the water remains clear, then it may be considered free from the phosphates with which sewage water is impregnated.

Reasonable.

Two Irishmen one day went shooting. A large flock of pigeons came flying over their heads. Pat elevated his piece and, firing, brought one of them to the ground. "Arrah!" exclaimed his companion, "what a fool you are to waste your ammunition, when the bare fall would have killed him!"—Pick-Me-Up.

Evil Wrought by Want of Thought.

Lack of thought is often at the root of our mistakes in this world. Even our most serious mistakes, over which we have prayed in anguish, could in all probability have been averted if we had given to our problems a little gift of time and thought.

Old, But Wise Advice.

At the beginning of the cask and at the end take thy fill, but be saving in the middle, for at the bottom saving comes too late. Let the price fixed with a friend be sufficient, and even dealing with a brother call in witnesses, but laughingly.—Hesiod.

As Success Is Measured.

Success is measured by appropriate service. Widow O'Callaghan made a success in life; so did the mother in the "Bird's Christmas Carol;" so did the mother of "Tiny Tim." Success means filling a useful place in society.

Middle Course the Best.

Lobster and champagne for supper—that's high jinks. Sawdust and near-coffee for breakfast—that's hygiene. Between these two eminences, however, there's room for some genuine living.

Merely Nagging.

It is surprising how many "don'ts" are said every day to children who are really doing nothing in the least harmful to themselves or to other people.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1909. NUMBER 6

NOBLE OAKLAND WOMAN GONE TO HER REWARD

After Years of Suffering Mrs. Eleanor J. Davis Passed Away This Morning.

Mrs Eleanor J. Davis, wife of Rev. John M. Davis, of Oakland, died at the family home in Oakland this morning at half past six o'clock after an illness extending over four years, of a complication of diseases. Thus one of God's chosen ones has received her reward for a life spent in contemplation of the future; a life devoted to her family and by precept and example following in the footsteps of the Lowly One. Mrs. Davis was the daughter of Alexander Philson, of Berlin, Pa., and was born June 13th, 1836. On March 4th, 1848, she married, her death this morning severing a happy union of more than fifty-one years' duration. Besides her husband Mrs. Davis leaves two sons, Messrs. Charles S., and John W. Davis, all of Oakland. Another son, Rev. William C. Davis, died a few years ago. The death of this son left a void in the life of his devoted mother and it may be stated that her decline in health was coincident with his demise. Mrs. Davis was a member of St. Paul's M. E. church for more than half a century; she lead a pure, noble Christian life; at all times and under all circumstances in harmony with the doctrines of her church and in accord with her conscience. Her death removes from Oakland one who was loved, respected and revered for her kindly acts and deeds of charity; her love of home and home ties and all that makes life beautiful. Words are inadequate to convey to the mind the loveliness of her character and the deep respect in which she was held by her hosts of friends. Her funeral will occur Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock from St. Paul's M. E. church.

SAMUEL A. PHILSON.

Samuel A. Philson, brother of Mrs. Eleanor J. Davis, whose death is noted above, died at his home in Berlin, Pa., on Saturday, March 27th, 1909, aged 77 years, 9 months and 22 days. The cause of Mr. Philson's death was paralysis, with which he was stricken ten days prior to his demise. He was a prominent and life long resident of Berlin.

DR. EDWARD P. IRONS.

Died, in Baltimore, on Sunday last, Dr. Edward P. Irons, aged 84 years. He is survived by one daughter, Mrs. Annie R. Ramsey, of Windsor Hill, Baltimore, who is well known here. Dr. Irons was an uncle of Mrs. S. E. Shirer.

CHARLES MOORE.

Died, at the residence of Mr. Enoch Kessner, Loch Lynn Heights, Tuesday evening, Charles Moore, in the 37th year of his age, after a brief illness. Deceased was born in the Beckman settlement and spent most of his life in this neighborhood. He was a very exemplary young man and was well liked by all who knew him. His only near relative is a sister residing in Baltimore. He was a consistent member of the M. E. church and an Odd-Fellow. The funeral services will be at 1 oclock p. m. to-day under the direction of the Odd-Fellows. Rev. Bolton will conduct the services, assisted by Revs. Idleman and Stoneking. The interment will be in the Beckman cemetery.

MRS. HANNAH A. BOWMAN

Died, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Virginia Pierce, Mountain Lake Park, Friday night, April 2nd, 1909, after a brief illness, Mrs. Hannah A. Bowman, at the age of 88 years, 9 months and 3 days. She was the daughter of Moses and Hannah Bowers, and was united in marriage to Adam Bowman March 17th, 1842, this union being blessed with ten children, nine daughters and one son. Of these three daughters and the son preceded her to the heavenly country; also her husband. Mother Bowman was converted at seven years of age and three years later joined the Methodist Episcopal church, being a member of this body for more than seventy-seven years, and being a faithful and true follower of her Lord and Master for more than eighty-one years. She leaves to mourn her loss six daughters and a large number of grand and great grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted at Rowlesburg, W. Va., Monday, April 5th, by her pastor, Rev. J. O. Bolton, of Mt. Lake Park, assisted by Rev. Hanna, of Rowlesburg, in the M. E. church, her body being interred in the Rowlesburg cemetery beside that of her husband to await the final resurrection of the dead.

Married.

SMOUSE—STANTON.—Mr. Ralph T. Smouse, son of the well-known lumber dealer, ex-City Councilman Thomas F. Smouse, was united in marriage to Miss Ruth Stanton, of Grantsville, Md., last evening at six o'clock, in the parlors of the Gladstone Hotel. The ceremony was performed by Rev. F. A. Wagner, pastor of St. Paul's Lutheran church, Frostburg, in the presence of a few friends of the young couple. After the marriage a wedding dinner was partaken of by Mr. and Mrs. Smouse and their guests, and later in the evening they took a carriage for Cumberland. Mr. Smouse is a well known young Cumberlander and is in the employ of his father, in the Third National Bank building. His bride, a charming young lady, is the daughter of Mr. William Stanton, a prosperous farmer of Grantsville, Md., and a niece of Mr. Louis Stanton, a Frostburg hardware merchant. They will reside in Cumberland. Monday's Cumberlrnd News.

ROBBED MAILS FOR LONG TIME

Young Carrier Arrested by Inspector Allen.

In the fastness of Laurel Mountain, along a lonely road that winds over the hills and along the chasms from Bruceton Mills, in Preston county, W. Va., to Fairchance, Pa., William C. Leib, U. S. star route carrier until Tuesday, accomplished feats of lawlessness that have not been equalled since the institution of the star route system by the government. With the cunning of the shrewdest crook this mountaineer of less than 21 has been systematically robbing the U. S. mail given to his keeping to the extent that the people whom he serves have abandoned the use of the mails altogether. Leib is now confined in the Uniontown, Pa., jail, having been placed there Tuesday evening by Postoffice Inspector E. I. Allen, to whom credit for remarkable work must be given.

The road between the Mills and Fairchance is an unused one, there being but few houses along its narrow windings. But one-fourth of the distance is in West Virginia, the rest drifting from the Pennsylvania State line down the mountain to Fairchance where the postoffice is the feeder of the route. For months, after the appointment of Leib to the route, letters and other mail disappeared but no blame was laid to the door of the uncouth looking mountaineer. Time went on and the disappearance of important letters became more prevalent. Soon registered mail, locked securely in the pouch carried by Leib began to disappear and this kept up with such regularity that the patrons along the route became suspicious.

No simple minded country folks were so well versed with the proper precedure to carry the matter before the Department at Washington. Instead they began to look for the thief in their own way. In the meantime suspicions began to fasten on Leib and finally those who had been victimized by him followed him over the mountain.

In the road, fragments of letters, scraps of newspapers and other pieces of mail were discovered in his wake, showing he did not care to carry unnecessary weight and mail that looked unimportant to him he tore to pieces and threw by the way side.

At a secluded place in the mountains he placed in hiding his outfit for robbing the pouches. This consisted of a key which fitted the pouches, scissors and mucilage similar to that used on envelopes.

His plan was to get his pouch at Fairchance, carry it to his tools and then use his key. If the contents looked inviting, he would open the letters extract a portion of the money and then reseal the envelopes and send them on their way. Inspector Allen is of the belief that hundreds of dollars were taken by him in this manner. Leib demonstrated his smoothness by the fact that he never took all the money from a letter.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

A number of cottages have been rented recently, among the number we note the following:

The Waugh cottage to Mr. John D. Hayden.

The Bates cottage near the lake to a Mr. Fetty, of near Morgantown, W. Va.

The Heartsease cottage to a gentleman from Charleston, W. Va.

The Young cottage to Mr. James Anderson, who has been residing on the Major Burns farm.

The Allen cottage near the Hayden store building, to Mr. Jas. A. Enlow.

Mrs. Frank Rathbun is lying at the point of death at the home of a relative near Cleveland, Ohio. She had been operated on for an internal cancer. No hopes are entertained for her recovery. Mr. Rathbun was summoned to her bedside Monday.

Rev. and Mrs. Hart, who have resided in this community for several years, will return to their old home in Morgantown, W. Va., about June 1st.

A line of sewerage, about one-half mile in length, commencing at the main in front of the Mountain Lake hotel and running to Wheeling avenue, is being put in under the direction of Mr. J. L. Echard. This line, together with the necessary laterals, will give sewerage to the entire northeastern section of the Park.

Monday and Tuesday the Little Yough in the neighborhood of the Park was lined with fishermen, but owing to the swollen condition of the stream, the catch was light.

Rev. Joseph Lee leaves today on a visit to England and Ireland. He will be absent about two months.

Lumber is being put on the ground for the new flour mill at Lock Lynn.

NATURAL GAS FOR OAKLAND ALMOST ASSURED

The Matter To Be Determined by the Attitude of Her Citizens.

Whether or not natural gas will be brought to Oakland by the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company altogether depends upon the attitude of the residents of the town, as the matter has been placed before the people by Mr. J. D. Northrup, general superintendent of the company, and Mr. J. D. Cheuvront, manager of the Lonaconing division of the gas company, through the Oakland Board of Trade, which body held a meeting in the Council chamber last night and appointed seven soliciters to visit every property holder in Oakland today and to make their raports at another meeting of the Board to be held tonight at eight o'clock.

Last nigh 's meeting, in the absense of Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, president of the Board of Trade, was presided over by Mr. D. M. Mason, its vice president, with Mr. Samuel Lawton as secretary.

The solicitors appointed were given specified territory to cover so that no property owner will be missed and none will be approached by more than one solicitor. The solicitors were furnished blank agreements to be signed by the property owners whereby they agree with the gas company to become takers of gas for a term of three years from October 1st, 1909, at the flat rate of 25 cents per thousand cubic feet.

The meeting last night was largely attended and those present were enthusiastic over the fact that gas may be brought to Oakland during the present summer.

The plan of the gas company is to tap the trunk line of pipes at Gorman and come through Loch Lynn to Oakland and thence to Terra Alta. At the latter place a proposition in effect the same as was made to the Oakland people is under consideration and our neighbors at Terra Alta are woaking with a vim and push that will surely win. Oakland, not to be outdone, should fall into line and use every endeavor to get the gas here, which will add materially to the comfort and well being of our citizens; will bring to us added numbers and more desirable residents; will be the means of planting industries in our midst and with the added number of residents will cause our merchants to sell more goods, create a better market for the product of our farms and truckers and make it possible to heat and light our home and places of business and operate gas engines at a much lower rate than we are accustomed to paying. In addition to these things the burdens of the housewife will be materially lessened, for with gas ranges and heaters very little or possibly no dirt or dust will accumulate.

That the gas will come depends largelargely upon the success attending the efforts of the solicitors who start out this morning to interview the residents of Oakland. That gas is more economical than coal goes without saying; that it is safe to use there is no doubt, provided the proper care is exercised, and the comfort attending its use cannot be appreciated by any except those who have been consumers in places where gas is considered as much of a necessity as coal is in Oakland or any other place where gas has not been introduced.

In passing, at the meeting last night a large number of agreements were signed by those present and handed into the secretary of the Board of Trade. The signers included bankers, merchants, newspaper men and men in private life.

To get gas into Oakland depends upon the outcome of today's work by the solicitors Sign the agreement when it is presented and you will never regret the act!

COUNTY BOARDS TO MEET

Governor Calls Gathering Of Commissioners For April 21.

Governor Crothers Monday sent out invitations to the meeting of County Commissioners, which he has scheduled for April 21. The invitations were sent particularly to the president of each board, to the counsel and to the clerk. It is stated in the invitations that such other members as care to come will be welcome, but the presence of these officials is especially desired. The meeting will be held at 10 o'clock in the morning in the State Board rooms of the Union Trust Building.

Interest in the coming conference has been aroused all over the state and the developments there will be watched closely by the people in every county. No such gathering has ever been called together before, and exactly what is to be "sprung" upon the County Commissioners when they arrive is not known. The Governor, in explaining his purpose in assembling the County Commissioners, indicates that he has in mind some practical reforms in which he hopes to get the co-operation of the county people.

One of these is the question of repairing roads. In the opinion of the Governor as well as others who have had opportunity for looking into the matter the present method in force in most of the counties leaves much to be desired. In one or two counties, up-to-date modern, progressive methods are used and the people get full value for the money they spend. In a number of them this is not the case. It is understood the Governor believes that the system of mending roads should be uniform in all the counties and he has a number of suggestions along this line, by which money can be saved and better results obtained, which he will lay before the Commissioners as well as to ask them for suggestions and information.

Another proposition which the Governor expects to bring up is that of election expenses. It is his belief that at least $25,000, and probably much more, can be saved in the counties at each election without in the slightest impairing the efficiency and fairness of the elections. He also believes that a similar sum can be saved at each election in Baltimore city, if the right method is adopted. He expects to get some information and to ask some questions on this line at the meeting as well as to make some proposals.

A third matter which will come up is the question of uniform county government. The Governor will submit to the County Commissioners whether better government, less expensive and more efficient, cannot be obtained by having each county governed in one way and that the most modern way, than by having a different system in each county. He expects to get from the meeting much information that will be of value to him, and from the responses received since the announcement was first made that he intended to call this conference, it is probable that his ideas will meet with an energetic response.

The interest which the county people have taken in the State road question has been of the most intense kind. The Governor is anxious to impress upon the minds of the County Commissioners, who are the governing bodies in the different counties, that unless the work the State is doing in building good roads is supplemented by the counties themselves it will fall short of what is really desired. Each county, he believes, should find in the work the State is doing and the money it is spending in building good roads, a stimulant to action for itself, not only in building roads to serve as complements to the State roads, but in properly repairing those they have.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower since our last repoit:

John Baxter Brown and Fannie Bryant, both of Piedmont, W. Va.

John Thomas Calhoun, of Keyser, W. Va., and Minnie Margaret Kemphfer, of Rodamer, W. Va.

Bliss Jamison and Mollie Elizabeth Nethkin, both of Oakland.

Arlie Clarence Talkington and Bertie M. DeVault, both of Fairmont, W. Va.

CONTRACT FOR WATER WORKS AND SEWERAGE

Awarded Monday Night By Council to Wm. Tunney, of Joliet, Ill.

At the meeting of the City Council Monday night a step forward which will eventually give to Oakland a metropolitan air, and which will mean more to its citizens a few years later than they can possibly realize now, was taken, when the contract for the installation of a water system and the construction of sewerage for the entire municipality was awarded to William Tunney, of Joliet, Ill.

Mr. Tunney was one of a great number of contractoas who submitted their bids at a previous meeting of Council and which after careful consideration and tabulation was found to be the lowest, the figures at which the contract was awarded him being $31,784 for water and sewerage system complete, including the reservoir of three hundred thousand gallons' capacity, but exclusive of the hose house and pumping station, the contracts for these buildings being deferred until a later day, it being discovered only a day or two previous to the awarding of the contract to Mr. Tunney for the water system that the municipal lot on Third street is but forty by forty feet and that the plans drawn and adopted by Council for the municipal building contemplates a structure 28x50 feet, hence the plans will necessarily have to be redrafted and the proposed building made so it can be erected on the site provided for it. Who is responsiole for this misfit of building and lot no one seems to know. New plans are now under way by the engineer and the deferred erection of the building will not in any manner retard the work on the water and sewerage systems.

Under the contract between Mr. Tunney and Council one hundred and fifty days is the time specified for the completion of the work of installing the two systems, the contractor agreeing to begin excavating for the reservoir within a few days and as soon as that is under way he will begin excavating for the pipes.

By an agreement between Council and Mr. Tunney the plans for the sewerage will be changed in some particulars as will also that of the water pipes. The drawings of the engineer do not contemplate the laying of water or sewerage pipes along one or nwo of the streets where Council deems best they should go, this being one of the changes agreed; another is that of the outfall of the sewage in the east end of town.

In addition to letting the contract above referred to, Messrs. D. E. Boiden, James H. Painter and Charles Liller, the three recently elected Councilmen were sworn into office by Mayor West, and the Council was organized by the election of Mr. J. M. Stanton as president; Mr. John C. Dunham, clerk, Mr. W. R. Offutt, attoney. Other officers who qualified were Mr. D. M. Mason, tax collecter; William Browning and Bartlett Nethken, policeman.

BITTINGER.

This week began with delightful spring weather, accompanied by bright sunshine which coaxed the bees and flies from their winter stupor.

In spite of predictions of local weather prognosticators, who foretold a failure of the maple sugar crop this season, all the camp owners have gathered a satisfactory quantity of very fine sugar and are now talking of closing their camps for the season.

Miss Minnie Kamp, of Accident, spent a few days last week in this village, the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Jonas Bittinger.

Edward Moon, of Piedmont, W. Va., was visiting his cousin, Mrs. Arlettie Beachy, at this place, last week.

Miss Lizzie Orendorf returned to her home at this place last Friday evening, after having taught a successful term in the Duckworth school during the school year just closed.

W. A. Althers conducted an old time song service at the "Savory Hill" school house on last Suuday evening.

Mr. Beckman, of Meadow Mountain, drove to this village last Monday morning and left a quantity of good things to eat at the Lutheran parsonage as a donation from the friends of the pastor.

Lloyd Brenneman has his shingle mill in operation and is cutting shingles for Cornelius Bowser and others.

PAGES FROM THE GARRETT COUNTY ROAD RED BOOK

State of Maryland
MARYLAND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY
Highways Division.

Baltimore, Md., March 3, 1909.

Board of County Commissioners of Garrett County,
Oakland, Md.,

Gentlemen:

I have carefully studied the rules and instructions, as given in the pamphlet so headed, and would earnestly recommend them for careful study by your Road Supervisors, and that they may be followed in detail. By so doing I am sure marked improvement will soon be manifest in the roads of the county.

I particularly advocate the persistent use of the log drag as therein referred to.

Very respectfully,
W. W. CROSBY,
Chief Engineer.

A ROAD RED BOOK

Of Rules and Instructions for use of Supervisors in Garrett County, Md.

"A country road like every other piece of human work, is bad, or tolerable, or good, just in proportion to the amount of sense and ingenuity that has been put into its construction; and a well done job is a testimonial to the maker's intellect.

"A good road is a splendid investment; it raises the value of every acre of land within its reach; it shortens distance, saves time, wagons, horse flesh, harness, increases the load and lessens the burden, and makes it possible to haul two tons to market with the same power that now leaves one ton stuck in the mire. It brings us closer together, drives out gloom, makes neighbors of hermits, discounts every farm mortgage and brings joy and contentment to every community. Imagine a man, knee deep in mud, trying to look cheerful?

"Every citizen ought to contribute his mite of sense to the management of the public roads. It is the most important question that can claim his attention."—I. B. Potter, in Country Roads.

ROAD SUPERVISORS AND THEIR WORK.

"The road supervisor having a certain district in charge should, as early as possible in the spring and before the snow and ice have entirely disappeared from the roads, go over and inspect every portion of the roads entrusted to his care and notice particularly the flow of the water along the ditches and through the culverts, paying special attention to the flow on the nearly level portions. Notes should be made that will enable him to work the ditches properly after the roads have become dry, and when there is no way of determining which way the water should run, except by the more expensive method of employing an engineer.

"As soon as possible to do such work, all lines of drainage should be opened and kept open until the road-bed is entirely drained; care should be taken to lead all surface flow into the proper channels and not allow it to remain on the traveled way. Careful attention to this important preliminary work will go far toward putting the roads into good condition and make future work easier, more satisfactory and more lasting.

"Under our present system of spring road repairs, much of the work has been rendered necessary by reason of neglect or careless work in the preceding fall, and where the road has been so neglected that it has been allowed to freeze up in bad condition, extra work must be done to counteract the continued effects of such neglect."—From Red Book of Minnesota, 1907.

Do not accept the office of supervisor unless you are willing to give your time and very best energy for the public good. When you have qualified, go over all the roads that will be under your charge and study the problems with which you will have to deal; that of drainage will always be uppermost. Consult with abutting land owners and wherever practicable make agreements with them for the working of the smoother sections of the road with a drag, at a nominal sum, noting the agreement in a book to be kept for that purpose.

Begin work early in the spring as soon as the frost is out of the ground. At this time the earth is soft and comparatively easy to move. Where heavy grading and "crowning" of the road is necessary it is all the more important to begin early before the ground has hardened.

Where the ground is stony or where much earth must be moved from the gutters, first use a plow to loosen it, and then grade up the solid earth into the "crown," rejecting all organic matter, mud or stone. Here the drag is most useful in shaping and giving the proper "slope."

It is time and money wasted to attempt to work the public highways with a road machine alone at any time. Do not attempt to move a large amount of earth with a drag at any one time, but repeat the dragging often and the result will show for itself.

Where you have narrow flat roads without drainage try to improve them. Take the worst places, the impassable mud holes, the guttered hills, the steep grades; work them first and fix them so that the improvement will be permanent.

Continue to go over the roads throughout the season, repairing any soft spot before it becomes a mud hole, keep the drainage open and remove all loose stones. Keep the road work in the hands of one set of men if possible and pull the drags and plows with the same teams all the time; both horses and men will do better and more work each succeeding day.

Keep an account of each day in detail, the work accomplished, the men and teams employed, and the cost; this will often show the way to a material saving of money.

Try to reduce your work to a system. Consult freely with the road engineer and gain the advantage of his advice.

Try to awaken pride in your working force to accomplish the greatest amount of work possible in the time allotted.

"Not money alone makes good roads, or makes the roads better, but skill in plans and labor."

ROAD DRAINAGE.

The most important subject that can be considered in the construction or repair of roads is that of drainage; it matters not whether the material is sand, clay, gravel or macadam. A road to be good and to remain good MUST be well drained. What we want is a hard, smooth surface for travel. As a roof sheds water from a building, so the road surface should drain and dry off quickly, keeping the subsoil firm and hard.

In building or working any road the subsoil should be given natural drainage if possible; if this cannot be done it must be drained artificially in order to furnish a solid foundation to hold the wearing surface or roof upon which it must depend to shed the surface water. If the foundation is wet and springy no amount of work upon the surface will keep a road in good condition.

Do not forget that water will continually seek the lowest level whether on surface or in subsoil, and in doing so the natural flow is along lines of gradual curves.

The great significance of drainage is too often lost sight of in the repair of country roads. Time, labor and money are wasted by an endless fight with water and mud, when if the worker would pause to study the principles involved and apply them to the case in hand permanent good would be accomplished. The cause of a bad spot in a country road is often not immediately where the result is shown but some distance away.

Never leave a bank or ridge of earth or stone no matter how small upon the lower or open side. The water must drain off freely and neglect of this rule is usually the cause of badly washed and gullied hillsides. All drainage on hillsides should be diagonally across the roadway to insure the easy and rapid flow of water away from the road.

Give every earth road a "crown" above the side gutters of one inch to each foot of width.

"Keep all water moving off of the road, out of the road and away from the road."

DITCHES AND CULVERTS.

"In opening and excavating ditches it is too frequently the custom to follow along the surface, making them of equal depth at all points. It is not wise to do this, nor to commence the construction of a new road without a thorough knowledge of the actual lay of the land as respects the line of drainage, and a few dollars spent in getting an accurate profile of the work will be returned many times over in lessening the cost of construction and expense of future maintenance. There should be a continuous fall in the ditch along the entire line of the road to some principal line of drainage, and where a low place intervenes side drainiage should be provided for; but it frequently occurs that there is a low place encountered which it is practically impossible to drain either along the road or laterally; in such case the road should be raised high enough above the highest stage of water to prevent the water from soaking into and softening it; and if the surface flow of water is not too great small round cisterns or basins can be dug upon one or both sides of the right of way and the water from the road ditches led into them; thus the subsoil is drained and relieved of standing water."

To take water out of the road well formed deep gutters will accomplish much, with frequent culverts to carry the water off to the lowest level. In some cases sub-drains dug 2 to 4 feet deep on one or both sides of the 12 foot traveled road way and laid with tile or field stone will be necessary to dry out and keep the subsoil hard and solid. Such stone drains will repay their cost upon almost any earth road on which there is a large amount of travel.

The subsoil will dry out so much earlier in the spring and all through the season the surface will show the good effect. Water will flow in a drain which has a fall of but one inch in one hundred feet, but the grading must be perfect to accomplish this.

Drainage water must not only be taken from the roadway but carried off of the right of way.

Upon a hillside the gutter upon the upper side of the road should be broad and deep enough to carry away all water coming from the hill. All banks and gutters should be given a slope of 1½ feet horizontal to 1 foot vertical, and the road surface should slope both toward the gutter and toward the lower or free side, and there should never be a ridge or bank to obstruct this drainage away from the road.

All culverts and sub-drains should be below the frost line. Do not use wooden box culverts. Concrete, stone or tile are much cheaper in the end. To get the culverts properly placed requires deep side drains or gutters and great care in the selection of the point where they are put in, so that the water taken from the road will be carried out of and away from the right of way. If the necessary depth cannot be obtained better use hewed logs or wood mud sills, or better, concrete walls two feet apart in the clear, and cover with three white oak plank 2x12 inches level with the road surface. Breakers, or "thank you ma'ams," should be done away with; they are at best a makeshift for drainage. They are hard upon the wagons; where numerous prevent the proper working of the road with the machine or drag, and are constantly either filling up and allowing water to flow over them or else forming a mud hole upon their upper side. If water must be taken off the roadway form a long V shaped ridge with the point up the hill, then carry the water under the road by means of a culvert.

PUDDLED EARTH.

"A sample of moist clay taken from a roadbed will be found practically impervious to water; it may be roughly shaped into a dish of damp earth which will be found water tight. Earth in this condition is what clay workers call puddled. It has been worked and re-worked by the wagon wheels and animals' hoofs until nearly all the traveled portion of a sticky, muddy road is covered with a layer of this impervious puddled earth. As usually found on most of the roads, this puddled earth is full of holes and ruts which are filled with water that cannot escape through the impervious soil. As long as the water remains the soil cannot dry out and the road is kept in a most uncomfortable, if not impassable condition. It is also a matter of observation that this puddled earth when compressed and dried becomes very hard. On these two facts, the imperviousness of puddled earth and its hardness when dry, rest the theory of road dragging.

"When the road drag is properly used it spreads out the layer of impervious soil over the surface of the road, filling up the ruts and hollows until a smooth surface is secured. By forcing the mud into the hollows and ruts, it is evident that the water must go out, which it does by running off the side of the road. The drying out of the road is thus facilitated and the road is made immediately firmer because the water is squeezed out. It takes some time to reap the full and ultimate benefit of the drag, but after the first few draggings it will be noticed that the road is becoming constantly smoother and harder so that the effect of the rain is scarcely noticeable, the water running off the surface which is so smooth and hard as to absorb but little of it.

"It may be well to observe the action of the split-log drag in this connection. Now, a grader or road machine, or even a single plank scraper shod with iron, or even the front slab of the log when it is shod, will have a cutting action with a tendency to leave the soil at the surface of the road toughened and slightly lifted up. This condition is not favorable for shedding the next rain, but the split-log drag (with only the front slab shod) leaves the surface in a very different condition because the hind slab, not being shod, becomes polished and as it is drawn over the moist soil smooths, and smears and packs. Numerous practical road draggers have expressed to me their appreciation of this cementing effect and assert it is to this, in connection with the grade secured, and the smooth surface, that these marvelous results are due."—D. W. King.

WHEN TO USE THE SPLIT-LOG DRAG.

The split-log drag should be used when the ground is moist, but not so wet that the earth will stick to the drag. Early in the spring when the frost is coming out of the ground and the roads are sloppy it is well to drag a few times and hasten the smoothing and drying. Continue dragging throughout the season, after each rain, thus the surface will become compact and hard and be in the the best condition to shed the next rain. This practice will give the best results.

The split-log drag is the most valuable complement of the road machine, and will put the surface in a condition that the machine alone cannot do, if the drag is used when the ground is moist.

Each farmer whose land abuts upon a public road should be induced to make and keep a drag in use.

Many times after a hard rain the ground is too wet for him to work in it, yet not too wet to use the drag.

A short time spent upon the road with a team and drag will not be missed, and will add to his own and his neighbors' comfort when next they have occasion to go to town.

TO MAKE THE SPLIT-LOG DRAG.

Do not make the drag too heavy; do not make it out of sawed timbers, for the sharp edges of the split-log will do more effective work.

The drag should be light enough for one man to handle easily, and the weight of the driver is usually sufficient.

A dry log has its advantages, but anything will do. An elm, walnut, chestnut or soft maple, are preferable to oak or hickory.

"The log should be 7 to 8 feet long and from 10 to 12 inches in diameter and carefully split down the middle. The heaviest and best slab should be selected for the front. At a point on this front slab 4 inches from the end that is to be the middle of the road locate the center of the hole to receive a cross stake, and 22 inches from the other end of the front slab locate the center for another cross stake. The hole for the middle stake will lie on a line connecting and half way between the other two. See figure 8. The back slab should now be placed in position behind the other. From the end which is to be at the middle of the road measure 20 inches for the center of the cross stake and 6 inches from the other end locate the center of the outside stake. Find the center of the middle hole as before. When these holes are brought opposite each other one end of the back slab will lie 16 inches nearer the center of the roadway than the front one, giving what is known as a "set back." The holes should be 2 inches in diameter. Care must be taken to hold the auger plumb in boring these holes in order that the stakes shall fit properly. The hole to receive the forward end of the chain should be bored at the same time.

"The two slabs should be held 30 inches apart by the stakes. Straight-grained timber should be selected for the stakes so that each stake shall fit snugly into the 2-inch hole when the two slabs are in the proper position. The stakes should taper gradually toward the ends. There should be no shoulder at the point where the stakes enter the slab. The stakes should be fastened in place by wedges only.

"When the stakes have been placed in position and tightly wedged, a brace 2 inches thick and 4 inches wide should be placed diagonally to them at the ditch end, as shown in figure 8. The brace should be dropped on the front slab, so that its lower edge shall lie within an inch of the ground, while the other end should rest in the angle between the slab and the end stake.

"A strip of iron about 3½ feet long, 3 or 4 inches wide and ¼ inch thick may be used for the blade. This should be attached to the front slab, so that it will be ¾ inch below the lower edge of the slab at the ditch end, while the end of the iron toward the middle of the road should be flush with the edge of the slab. The bolts holding the blade in place should have flat heads and the holes to receive them should be countersunk." Have the holes in the iron blade made at equal distances from each end, so that when one edge becomes worn the blade can be reversed and the same bolts will fit.

"If the face of the log stands plumb it is well to wedge out the lower edge of the blade with a three cornered strip of wood to give it a set like the bit of a plane.

"A platform of inch boards held together by three cleats should be placed on the stakes between the slabs. These boards should be spaced at least an inch apart to allow any earth that may heap up and fall over the front slab to sift through upon the road again. The end cleats should be placed so that they will not rest upon the cross stakes but drop inside them, while the middle cleat can be shifted to either side of the middle stake. These cleats should extend about an inch beyond the finished width of the platform.

"An ordinary trace chain is strong enough to draw the implement, provided the clevis is not fastened through a link. The chain should be wrapped around the rear stake, then passed over the front slab. Raising the chain at this end of the slab allows the earth to drift past the face of the drag. The other end of the slab and is held by a pin passed through a link. One and one-half trace chains are sufficient.

"In many logs the grain runs around the tree in such a way that when split the slabs will be in 'wind.' If this wind is not more than 4 inches in 6 feet the timber can be used to good advantage by setting it so that the blade end of the log shall sla forward when the other end is perpendicula construction of the drag in this case is the given above, but care must be taken that t bored to receive the stakes are plumb. No under the lower edge of the blade is nec using such a log."

Drags can be made either right or left h will best suit the lay of the ground upon wi will be used.

HOW TO USE A DRAG.

"The successful operation of a drag involves two principles, which when thoroughly understood and intelligently applied, make road working with this implement very simple. The first concerns the length and position of the hitch, while the second deals with the position of the drag. Each influence the other to a large extent, and successful manipulation of the drag is dependent upon an understanding of both of them.

"For ordinary purposes the snatch link or clevis should be fastened far enough toward the blade of the chain to force the unloaded drag to follow the team at an angle of 45 degrees. This will cause the earth to move along the face of the drag smoothly and will give comparatively light draft to the team, provided the driver rides in the line of draft. Sometimes, however, conditions are met which require special treatment and in a rolling country such conditions are not infrequent. Often a flat piece several rods in length or a seepy spot needs special attention.

"The distance from the drag at which the team is hitched affects the depth of the cutting. Shortening the chain tends to lift the front slab from the ground; a longer hitch causes the blade to cut more deeply. The length of hitch may be regulated by lengthening and shortening the chain at the end which runs through the hole in the blade end of the drag.

"If small weeds are to be cut or a furrow of earth is to be moved, the doubletree should be attached rather close to the ditch end of the drag. The drag will move nearly ditch end foremost, and the driver should stand with one foot on the extreme forward end of the front slab. This will swing the drag back to the proper angle and will cause the blade to plow. This hitch requires slow and careful driving in order to prevent the drag from tipping forward. If the blade should plow too deeply, as it may in a wet spot, the driver should shift his weight toward the back slab.

"If straw and weeds clog the blade they can usually be removed if the driver shifts his weight to a point as far as possible from the ditch or blade end. Similarly, if he steps quickly away from the ditch end the load of earth may be dropped into a low place or mudhole.

"In soils full of loose stones or even small bowlders the drag has done a good service. The loose stones are drawn into a winrow down the center of the road while the earth is deposited around the bowlders in such a way that the surface is leveled. The loose stones in the center of the road should of course be removed. Where there is a large proportion of small stones or gravel the drag will keep down the inequalities in the surface.

"Do not expect to move a large quantity of earth at one dragging; move a little at a time, but drag often."—D. Ward King.

COST OF DRAGGING.

The cost per mile for dragging depends much upon local conditions, but has been found to be from $1.50 to $5.00 with an average of from $2.20 to $3.00 for repeated dragging. The prime saving of the drag is when it is in the hands of the abutting land owner, and is used frequently for a short time after rains which may have stopped work temporarily in the fields. When work is thus stopped and the harness is still upon the team, use the drag. Continuous application will produce marvelous results.

"The split-drag can do more for the improvement of a clay road for a small amount of money, if used as directed, than any known form of road machinery."

SUMMARY.

Keep water moving off the road, out of the road and away from the road.

Water is the worst enemy of the road.

Keep all drains and culverts open.

Give a "crown" of 1 inch in a foot to clay roads.

Place all under drains and culverts below the frost line.

Do not use wooden box culverts—they will not last.

Use concrete where permanent construction is done.

Organize your working force, and work under a system.

Keep the same men and teams working with the drag; the added amount and permanency of the work accomplished will show the wisdom of this plan.

Work the worst roads and stretches first.

Always repair the road surface with material of the same kind as road itself.

Never put grass, sod and vegetable matter upon the surface of a road; they hold moisture, are soft, will not compact, but make mud holes.

Leave no loose stones on the road, and keep them off by frequent watchfulness.

Do what you undertake to do thoroughly and well.

Put in permanent work wherever possible.

Consult the Road Engineer frequently.

Do not go over a hill if you can get around it.

The load that a team can pull is limited to the steepest grade.

Build no new road with a grade of over 6 feet in 100 feet.

Bring all outlying country roads to a standard width of 20 feet.

Do not build new "thank you ma'ams;" put in culverts instead.

Drainage first, last and all the time is the most important factor and problem in making and retaining a road in condition.

The proper slope for banks and side ditches is 1½ foot horizontal to 1 foot vertical.

Do not fill a rut or mud hole with stone; dig out the mud and fill with the same material as the road, tamp well and keep in the spot.

Do not give excessive "crown" to the road, or the wagon wheels will slide sidewise and form ruts which will hold water in the road.

In the winter note the flow of water and the drainage that your roads under your charge will require.

Begin to work the roads as soon as all the frost is out of the ground in the spring; you will accomplish twice the amount.

Where heavy work is to be done in grading ditches use the plow before the grader to loosen the earth and stone.

Use the drag to form and give the crown to new work, and run whenever the earth is moist follow with the use of a drag.

Wet, puddled earth, when spread by a drag becomes very hard when dry.

A split-log drag can be made of any wood, and the iron shoe though a great advantage is not necessary. Do not wait for it.

Make a light drag, light enough for one man to lift easily.

Ride the drag—do not walk.

The angle of draft and the length of the hitch regulate the work which the drag will perform.

Drag early in the spring; continue to drag after every rain; thus the surface will be in the best condition to shed the next rain.

Teach every farmer to make and use a drag in front of his place.

Have all tools, road machinery and material for repair ready ahead of the time when you expect to use them.

Do not use crushed or broken stone larger than will pass through a 2½ inch ring.

When the earth roads are either too wet or too dry for advantageous work, go to the stone roads and stony places.

Keep an account of each day's work so that you may learn where to save.

Water is the worst enemy of a road; good drainage will remove water.

ABSTRACTS OF ROAD LAW OF 1908.

"SECTION 201. The Board of County Commissioners of Garrett County shall appoint a Road Engineer for the County, who shall hold office for a term of four years, unless removed by a unanimous vote of the Board. Before appointment he must present to the Board of County Commissioners a certificate setting forth his competency to perform the work required of him. The Board shall fix his annual compensation, and allowance for expenses, and determine the amount of bond that shall be required of him.

Section 202. The Road Engineers shall have direct and complete charge and direction of the opening and repair of all roads and bridges in the County; he shall advise with, and direct the work of all District Supervisors; he shall furnish estimates and specifications for all new construction or repair to roads and bridges, and shall supervise their construction whether done by labor, or contract; he shall act as surveyor to the Board of Reviews, in the opening or re-location of roads or bridges, and make plats and profiles of the same without extra charge to the County; he shall care for all tools and machinery and other material owned by the County, and see that the same is kept in repair, inspecting all bridges of twenty-five feet or over in length, at least twice annually; he shall issue an illustrated book, to be paid for by the County, giving full and detailed rules and illustrations of the methods to be followed in the making of roads by District Supervisors; he shall, between the first day of April and the first day of September in each year, keep in constant touch with District Supervisors, and go from one District to another while the work of repairs is in progress; by and with the consent of the Board of County Commissioners, he may contract for any work or material which shall not cost upward of two hundred dollars; he shall in the fall of each year make a detailed report to the Board of County Commissioners, of the work which has been done in each Election District, and the cost of the same; the condition of the roads and bridges, and make any recommendations for the ensuing year which in his judgment will be of benefit.

"Section 203. In January of each year the Board of County Commissioners shall appoint one Road Supervisor for each of the Election Districts of the County, the appointee to be named from a list furnished them as hereinafter provided in Section 206-G; but nothing shall prevent their filling a vacancy at any time. They shall fix the per diem of Supervisors, which shall not be less than two dollars, and determine the amount of the bond which shall be required; they shall also fix the rate per diem of hired labor, teams with driver, etc., for the ensuing year. Upon recommendation of the Road Engineer they shall purchase all necessary tools, machinery, material or other things advisable or necessary for the opening or repairing of roads or bridges, and they shall at any time advertise and let all contracts for improvements costing upwards of two hundred dollars.

"Section 204. District Road Supervisors shall qualify by taking the oath of office and giving bond to the County Commissioners as soon as may be after their appointment; they shall have charge of the working and repair of all roads in their respective districts, under the general direction of the Road Engineer, and may contract for the building or repair of any culvert or bridge that shall not exceed in cost the sum of ten dollars, they may hire, and pay for out of funds in their hands, such men and teams as shall be necessary for the proper working of their roads; and shall annually render an itemized statement under oath with vouchers, to the Road Engineer to be by him transmitted to the Board of County Commissioners setting forth the number of men, and the teams employed, with the number of days for each, and the amounts paid to each (his own account being given separately), the total amount received by him, or placed to his credit, and the amount expended; the amount of Statute Labor employed; and the road assessment collected by him and from whom.

"Section 205. District Supervisors shall in April in each year, or earlier if possible, make a general inspection of all the roads in their districts, noting carefully the flow of water, and the drainage that will be necessary; they shall consult abutting property owners, and may if they see fit contract, for a sum less than ten dollars, with owners for doing certain specified work and repairs to roads and culverts bounding upon their lands, such work to be finished not later than May thirtieth; they shall pay for all hire of men and teams, and for material purchased, from the roads funds placed to their credit with the Treasurer of Garrett County, or in their hands, and shall take receipts for all money thus paid out; they shall consult the Road Engineer upon all important repairs and shall follow wherever possible the printed instructions which the Engineer shall furnish them in regard to the methods and manner of making roads.

"Section 206-A. When the District Supervisors shall have given the bond required of them by the County Commissioners, all funds shall be placed to their credit, and subject to their order in the hands of the County Treasurer.

"Section 206-B. Each of the District Supervisors shall do, or cause to be done all the regular annual repairs upon the roads and bridges under his control before the first day of September of each and every year; each of the District Supervisors shall be required to set aside five per cent. of all the monies coming into their hands from time to time for general road repair, this money so set aside shall be used only between the first day of September and the first day of April of the following year, for the unforseen and accidental repairs of the roads and bridges and for draining of roads, opening of breakers and culverts and snow drifts. Any money remaining in the hands of the County Treasurer to the credit of any District Supervisor at the expiration of the latter's term of office, shall be placed to the credit of the succeeding Supervisor of that District.

"Section 206-C. Every resident of Garrett County who shall habitually use a wagon wearing tires of three inches in width for all loads of one to two thousand pounds, and tires of four inches in width for loads of over two thousand pounds shall receive a credit of five per cent. on his annual road tax.

"Section 206-D. When a public road forms the dividing line between Election Districts, the County Commissioners shall apportion and designate what part of said road shall be worked by the several Supervisors.

"Section 206-G. At the respective District Primaries, of the two dominant political parties of the State, held in each Election District next preceding the annual November election, the qualified voters of each of said parties, attending such party primaries, shall nominate by ballot, two taxpayers of their own party whom they consider qualified to act as Road Supervisors for their district; and shall cause their names to be certified to by the Chairman and Secretary, or other officers of the primary in writing, and have the same forwarded to the Clerk of the Board of County Commissioners of Garrett County, to be put upon file by him, for the use of the Board, during the ensuing year."

Rather Severe Denunciation.

There is a story of Carlyle in his old age having taken the following farewell, in his broadest Scotch, of a young friend who had had him in charge for walks, and who, while almost always adapting himself to Carlyle's mood, had on a single occasion ventured to disagree with him: "I would have you to know, young man, that you have the capacity of being the greatest bore in Christendom."

Our Wives.

One of the most worthless men in Atchison has a wife who thinks he is simply grand. When a woman loves a man, she loves him, and that is all there is to it; it makes no difference how shiftless or worthy he may be. Napoleon, one of the few really great men the world has produced, had two wives, and both of them were unfaithful to him.—Atchison (Kan.) Globe.

A Modern Instance.

The higher education is not wholly in vain. Here is a student of the University of Pennsylvania who has so wisely communed with the great spirits of old that he is able to train a ten-dollar monkey to serve him as a valet, even to the blacking of the disciple's boots. They say no man is a hero to his valet. Wonder what this particular monkey thinks of his master?

Your Liver.

A bad liver is a public enemy. It is morose and growly and picks fault in everything. It breaks up families and creates dissensions among neighbors. It is suspicious, envious, and quarrelsome. There is nothing the state need to get after, on the score of the general welfare, more than the bad, vile and ridiculous livers which occupy the land.—Ohio State Journal.

Very Thin.

A policeman named Graham, operating in Philadelphia, found a baby in a doorway and it was promptly christened "Graham Wafer." It's the amusing side of an incident that in itself isn't amusing, but there may be a lot doing when that boy becomes big enough to resent being called a cracker.—Detroit Free Press.

At Dinner.

While two little boys were walking through a wood they heard some bees buzzing in a hollow tree. One boy held his head close to a hole to listen. Presently he jumped quickly away, crying to the other: "Johnny, those bees must be havin' their dinner, 'cause one stuck his fork in my ear."

Give the Eyes a Rest.

It is a good plan to close the eyes for five minutes every few hours. This will not only rest the eyes, but prevent the wrinkles known as "crow's feet" from making their appearance as early as they would otherwise.

Looks That Are Deceptive.

Don't trust the fellow who has a vacant look in a poker game. He generally has a full house.—Philadelphia Record.

MR. ROOSEVELT AT NAPLES.

The euthusiastic welcome which Mr. Roosevelt received at Gibraltar was repeated, and more, at Naples Monday. The demonstrations in the harbor and on shore were of a kind rarely accorded to a private citizen. Both Mr. Roosevelt and his nation have a right to feel proud of his reception. It is said that the city and bay could not have presented a gayer appearence if royalty were being honored instead of the former president of a republic beyond the seas. It was noticeable that even in the poorer quarters of Naples the houses were decorated. This is significant of the manner in which Mr. Roosevelt's fame has spread and of the appeal which his striking personality makes to all classes.

Now that the former president is out of the country and enjoying his well earned holiday, one or two partisan organs have the bad taste to criticize him for accepting such hospitality as has been extended at Gibraltar and Naples. They also find fault with his "luxurious surrouudings," afloat and ashore. In this they show their lack of logic. First, they insist that he is only a private citizen and should be treated as such, and then they proceed to criticize him as if he were an official personage answerable to the people. We have one of these cavillers here at home, who gets excited over Mr. Roooevalt's occupancy of "the emperor's suite" on the steamship and "a magnificient apartment in one of the best hotels" at Naples. The critic's ire is further aroused by "a motor boat in which to glide about the bay and an address of welcome." It is nobody's business how good a time Mr. Roosevelt has abroad, but everybody not suffering from an attack of early spring jaundice hopes he will have the best times possible. If he had his way he would, without doubt dispense with much of the ceremony in which his hosts indulge, but no man could be insensible to the sincerity and kindness of the feelings which thus find expression. However, the critics at home will have few more opportunities for a while, to make themselves ridiculous.

DON'T SHOOT THE EDITOR.

Gen. Meeks' argument in the Cooper trial, in favor of shooting the editor when no other remedy for a grievance is available, will be applauded by every scoundrel in the land who has been exposed to scorn in the public prints or is afraid that he will be, says the St. Paul Dispatch. It is not the malicious libel that spurs men to deeds of violence. The lie will recoil upon its author's head. It is the unimpeachable truth, uttered upon justifiable occasion, that moves the subject of it to frenzy and murder.

Gen. Meeks is guilty of willful misrepresentation in insinuating that the editor is a wholly irresponsible being. On the contrary, the editor is constantly on trial before the bar of public opinion. He is under a compelling obligation to deal justly with men ann women or to destroy his newspaper by forfeiting public confidence. He caries a burden of public responsibility unequaled in almost any other pursuit or profession. He discharges a trusteeship for the public and is held to the most rigid occountability.

THE DEATH OF CERVERA OF SANTIAGO FAME

The death of Admiral Cervera will recall to Americans the memory of a brave and manly foe who went to defeat with the spirit of the race that once ruled the world. When Cervera brought a Spanisn squadron to Cuba he knew better than anyone else that he was coming to sure destruction. At that time the Spanish people, ignorant of the resources of this country, could not be made believe that we could take Cuba without using half our strength. No Ministry could afford not to make a pretense to defend the "ever faithful isle," which was the last jewel in the Spianish crown, the most valuable colony in a hemisphere all of which at one time belonged to Spain. The crown itself might have been endangered by an angry people had it confessed its intention not to strike a blow for so rich a country as Cuba.

But Cervera knew his ships were poorly manned and that he had no chance with the American fleet in a pitched battle. Yet he went to what he believed his death without a murmur. When his ships were bottled up in Santiago bay and when it was apparent that the time was near when they might be pounded to pieces by guns mounted on the hills surrounding the bay, Cervera, shunning so ignominious an end decided to go ont into the open and take his chances in a sea fight. When his little spuadron sailed out of the bay it went to certain defeat, and no one knew better than the Admiral. He did his best in a way that was worthy of the best days of Spain.

There was general rejoicing when it was discovered that he had not found the death he sought. The heart of the American people went out to him. Even in the rejoicing at the victory we could not but feel admiration and pity for so brave a foe who with a force so inadequate had been compelled for his country's honor to make so desperate an effort. We remembered, too, his chivalrous conduct toward Hobson when he sank the Merrimac and was captured. Later in his captivity the old Admiral won all hearts by the fortitude with which he bore his misfortunes, and when he left this country upon the conclusion of peace it was with the warmest regard and respect of all who knew him.

TEACH GIRLS TO COOK.

President Silvester, of the Maryland Agricultural College, asks that Maryland girls be given the same chance as Maryland boys to acquire education. This seems to be trite and commonplace and sure enough it is, in respect to general educational training, for Maryland boys and girls have equal opportunities in the public schools. It is in special education, however, that the boys have superior advantages. The girls have no technical school in which they can prepare themselves for special work in the future.

Captain Silvester urges that the girls be given equal chances, that while the boys are trained as in the Maryland Agricultural College to be farmers, the girls should be trained in domestic science. The suggestion which Captain Silvester has thrown out is important. It offers an opportunity, if availed of, for Maryland girls to have a school of of their own where they will be able to learn how to sew and cook.

Indeed, the question is a very interesting one. Which is the better prepared for life's duties, the young man or the young woman, when as man and wife or separately they begin their struggle for a place in the world? In these modern days when women are so actively entering into competition with men as breadwinners and when they are claiming equal political opportunities it becomes a pressing question of the hour. "What shall we do without cooks?" Men can do without a great many things, but how can he dispense with cooks?

Captain Silvester offers a solution of our needs. He tells us to train our girls to be good cooks as he trains the boys at the agricultural college to be good farmers.

SENTENCED FOR ROBBING MAILS

Roy G. Powell, Clerk, Gets Three Years in Federal Prison.

Roy G. Powell, a railway mail clerk between Cumberland and Durbin, W. Va., pleaded guilty in the United States District Court in Baltimore Saturday, to robbing the mail and was sentenced by Judge Morris to three years in the Federal prison at Atlanta, Ga. The indictment charged him with taking from the mail and opening two letters on January 3 last.

Powell was caught by decoy letters sent by postoffice inspectors from Davis, W. Va., to John J. Stump & Co., wholesale whisky dealers in Cumberland. This firm had missed many letters and made complaint to the government. Since his arrest on January 4 Powell has been out on bail.

Powell lived in Gorman, Garrett county, and is a tall fine looking man. He is 29 years old and married. He has been a school teacher and served through the Spanish-American War, having an honorable discharge, which was exhibited to the court.

Attorney Walter C. Capper, of Cumberland, appeared for Powell and District Attorney John C. Rose for the Government.

The fact that Powell pleaded guilty and that he caused the government no trouble since his arrest and little expense by waiving a trial, secured for him a light sentence. The maximum sentence is ten years.

Legal Holiday Friday.

Tomorrow, Good Friday, being a legal holiday the banks of Oakland will be closed and at the postoffice Sunday hours will be observed.

Social Sing May 9.

There will be a social sing at Wesley Chapel, May 9 at 2 p. m., between the Pleasant Valley and Silver Knob choirs along with quartets, etc. Any choir wishing to take part can address Prof. I. F. Groves, Oakland, Md.

GARRETT COUNTY AND ITS NATURAL RESOURCES

Information Gleaned from the Annual Report of the Bureau of Statistics.

From the seventeenth annual report of the Bureau of Statistics and Information, a copy of which was forwarded THE REPUBLICAN by Mr. Charles J. Fox, Chief of the Bureau, the following concerning Garrett county is gleaned:

Garrett county comprises the western end of the State. It is bounded on the north by the Mason and Dixon Line, which separates it from Pennsylvania, on the west by West Virginia, on the south and southwest by West Virginia, and on the east by Allegany county. The Geological Survey divides the county into the Potomac Valley District, the Savage Valley District, the Glades Valley District, the Castleman Valley District and the Youghiogheny Valley District. Along the western boundary of the county there is an elevation of over 3,000 feet above the sea level. This includes the crest-line of the Great Backbone and Big Savage Mountains. Between these mountains lies a range of broad, flat-topped, or gently-arching hills.

The entire county is mountainous, but everywhere over the surface, covering hill and valley alike, is found a coating of soil varying in depth, and grading imperceptibly into the underlying or resting directly upon the surface of the rocks. In the valleys the soil is usually deep and productive, and on the mountain slope it is shallow and stony. In some places the soil is stained a deep red, not altogether unlike the underlying beds of shale and sandstone. In other places the productive clays seem to bear no relation whatever to the deeply-buried limestone, while on the mountain tops the soils seem but a mass of broken gray sandstone, mixed with small amounts of sand and clay. It is this soil covering with which the farmer has to deal.

The soils of Garrett county, in the valleys, yield easily to cultivation, and the principal products are buckwheat, oats, hay and potatoes, and a fair yield, in some sections, of wheat, rye and corn.

The principal manufactures of the county emanate from the forest, which are plentiful, and consist of lumber, shingles, staves, and the mining of coal and shale.

One of Garrett's chief sources of wealth is her minerals, coal, fire clay and limestone. The Georges Creek coal fields lies along the boundary line between Garrett and Allegany counties, the major portion being in the latter county, but considerable of the coal being in Garrett. The Georges Creek coal is known all over the United States as being of a superior quality. Along the Potomac River, the southeast boundary of Garrett, lies another field of coal, which is being developed.

While practically throughout the entire county coal may be found, as yet it is undeveloped, except as above stated, it being the smaller veins, and only worked where it lies near to railroads. It can be said Garrett's resources are inexhaustible. It is only within the past few years that small seams of coal are being worked, and as the years pass by and large veins become exhausted, it naturally follows that the small veins will be opened up more extensively.

The report of the Maryland Geological Survey of December, 1902, says:

"The coal of Garrett county is confined to the synclines, or, as they are called when they contain coal seams, 'coal basins.' The synclines of Garrett county are all coal basins. There are 5 of these coal basins lying partly in Garrett county. The Georges Creek basin lies in the northeastern part of the county to the east of the Savage mountain. The most important part of this basin lies to the eastward of Garrett county and has already been described in the publications of this survey. The Potomac basin lies in the southern and southeastern part of the county, to the east and south of Backbone mountain. The Potomac river flows near the axis of this basin, so only half of it is in Maryland. The basin is structurally the continuation of the Georges Creek basin The Castleman basin lies in the north-central part of the county, between Meadow and Negro Mountains. It is the continuation of the Salisbury basin of Pennsylvania. The Lower Youghiogheny basin lies in the northwest part of the county, to the west of Winding Ridge and to the north of Dog Ridge. It is the continuation of the Confluence basin of Pennsylvania. The Upper Youghiogheny basin lies in the west-central part of the county, between Snaggy mountain and a ridge, which is the continuation of the Meadow moutain, part of which are here called Roman Nose and Hall's Hill.

"The Lower Kittanning coal is shaft coal in the greater part of the area of the basin. There are small areas around the outcrop which can be mined by drift, but only on a small scale, except in the region southwest of Krug, where the entire area can be reached by drift from the valley of the Youghiogheny. Below Friendsville this coal lies at a depth not exceeding 300 feet below the railroad.

"Coal has been mined in the Georges Creek basin since 1830. Until recently only the Pittsburg seam has been mined, but with the approaching exhaustion of this coal, development of the thinner seams is rapidly increasing. The Bakestown, Upper Freeport and Lower Kittanning seams are at present being mined on a commercial scale in the Georges Creek and Potomac Valleys. Extensive developments, preparatory to mining the Upper Freeport and Lower Kittanning coals by shafting, have been in progress for the last two years at Henry. The Lower Kittanning coal has been mined for several years in the Upper Youghiogheny basin at Corinth. The coal in the Castleman and Lower Youghiogheny basins has never been mined, except for local use.

"It is probable that within a few year there will be very extensive developments in the Potomac, Castleman and Youghiogheny Valleys, especially in the former. Development has been retarded in the Castleman basin by the lack of means of transportation, and by the fact that the Allegany coals are buried in the central part of the basin. Now that a railroad has been constructed along the Costleman River, development of the coal may be expected.

"Ownership of the small-vein coal is principally in the hands of the farmers. Few large tracts have been acquired, except in the Georges Creek and Potomac basins.

"Garrett county contains a great abundance of valuable clay of various kinds. These resources are entirely undeveloped, except at the two fire-clay mines in the northeast corner of the county, but they will not stand a high enough temperature to be called or used as fire clay. The only satisfactory means of telling whether a clay is a fire clay or not is by testing its actual fusibility. Not all fire clay or not even all those in this region, underlies coal seams. There are at least two very valuable fire clays now known in Garrett county.

"The Mt. Savage fire clay occurs at a very constant horizon in the Mercer group, near the top of the Pottsville formation, and immediately under the Homewood sandstone. The belts are along the edge of the areas of outcrop of the Pottsville formation, not very far from the contact of the Pottsville and Allegheny.

"In the mines of the Union Mining Company and the Savage Mountain Fire-Brick Works, in the northeast part of Garrett county, the clay has a thickness of from 8 to 14 feet, averaging about 10 feet. It is overlain within a short distance by a seam of coal about 3 feet in thickness, above which is the Homewood sandstone. There are usually two kinds of clay, the soft or plastic, and the flint or non-plastic. Both are essential in the manufacture of the bricks. It is necessary that both should be refactory. There is no regularity in the occurrence of the two kinds of clay in relation to each other. Usually the plastic clay is above, but this is not always the case. The clay is well exposed in the west bank of the Potomac River, one mile above Blaine.

"There is a very large adjacent area from which the clay can readily be mined by drift, either here or around the hill to the north, in the valley of Wolfden Run. At the mouth of that run, or between there and Blaine, are admirable locations for a manufacturing plant, as coal is being mined on the hill above, and there is a bridge across the river at this point leading to the tracks of the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg Railroad. Tests made by Dr. Heinrich Ries show that the flint clay from this locality is fully equal in its refactory qualities to that from the mines on Savage Mountain, while the plastic clay from this locality is superior to that from Savage Mountain.

"Another locality where the same clay was observed is in the tramroad cut at Swallow Falls.

"At no other place has the clay been observed above the coal as it is here. There is a large area underlaid by the clay in this vicinity, which can be easily worked by drift, and the dip is slight. Transportation can be furnished by the narrow-gauge road, which extends from here to the terminus of the Confluence and Oakland branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Power for the plant can be secured from the Youghiogheny River and coal for the kilns can be obtained near at hand.

"Garrett county has lumbering interests second to none in the State. Their rapid growth in the past few years is due to the activity of the mills cutting hemlock. Three large mills are at work in the county, one is building and there is prospect of another. One of the mills has finithed cutting its Garrett county holdings and brings in logs from West Virginia. Two West Virginia companies secure part of their material from the slopes of Backbone Mountain. These large mills cut the hard and soft with the hemlock, and thus lengthen their operations. Unless the mills acquire and cut the defective ridge forests, they will have to be closed within the next ten years.

"The present annual cut of the mills of the county is about 25,000,000 feet. The small portable mills, of which there are a number in the county, cut less than one-fifth of this annual output. The bulk of the lumber cut is hemlock, while spruce, white pine, chestnut, oak, maple, beech and basswood furnish the remainder. The principal manufactured product is lumber, and with it large quantities of lath, shingles and barrels are produced.

"The object of the large companies is to cut and market as rapidly as possible all the material on their tracts. The mills are located on streams and the logs are brought from the woods over logging railroads. In one case the haul is over 15 miles. The mills are connected with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad by means of spurs, and load their product for shipment direct from the yards.

"The small mills do not run steadily, and the quality of lumber produced is generally poor. Their cut is mainly hardwood, and is, in many instances, from culled forest or small isolated bodies of fair timber. The logs are brought to the mills by teams and the manufactured lumber is hauled by wagons to shipping points. A few small mills are making soft-wood shingles, but find it difficult to obtain material for a continuous run."

According to the census of 1900 there were 1,788 farms in the county, the estimated value of which, in 1903, was about $4,671,500, and the total assessed value of property in the county amounted to $7,612,488.

Garrett has good facilities for reaching the markets of the East and West, being traversed by the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from east to west. The Western Maryland Railroad follows the Potomac River along the southeastern boundary of the county. The Confluence and Oakland Rail road runs from Confluence, Pa., to Krug, and Jennings Brothers' railroad from the Baltimore and Ohio, at West Salisbury, up the Castleman Valley to a point near Bittinger. The old National turnpike traverses the northern part of the county from east to west.

On account of the vast amount of humus in the soil in the "glades," the land is of great value for producing such crops as require a moist and cool climate. There is great opportunity for truck farming in Garrett county, as well as the raising of stock. Dairying could be profitably engaged in. Land is plentiful and can be bought cheap, say from $5 to $40 per acre, and as the county offers considerable advantages for the raising of fruits, berries and vegetables, these industries could be profitably engaged in. Oakland being but 11 hours from New York, and less to Baltimore and Washington, the mountain fruits and vegetables could be easily transported at profitable prices to these markets.

The tax rate of the county for 1908 was $1.06 per hundred.

There are 140 white schools in the county.

Only in Oakland is the sale of intoxicating liquor permitted in this county.

Oakland is the county seat, with a population of 1,500. Deer Park, Mountain Lake Park, Grantsville and Loch Lynn Heights are other incorporated towns.

Other towns in the county not incorporated are Accident, New Germany, Bittinger, Friendsville, Swanton, Bloomington, Altamont, Hutton, Crellin, Thayersville, Avilton, Sunnyside, Kitzmiller, Jennings, Beckman, Finzel, Hoyes, Krug, McHenry and Kendall.

Mr. and Mrs. Julius Scherr, of Charleston, W. Va., are in Oakland visiting Mr. and Mrs. Julius C. Renninger at their home on Liberty street.

Mrs. George W. Legge, who spent several weeks with her daughter, Mrs. Lynne, in Shenandoah Junction, returned to her home in Oakland Tuesday afternoon.

Miss Orpha Ashby, who graduated last week from the High School, will on next Monday open a private school for children in the first to fifth grades of the public school. Terms, $1 per month.

Mr. J. W. Bowers, of Crellin, where he has been employed for several years in a clerical capacity, has moved from that place to Oakland and is occupying Mrs. L. F. Sincell's property on Liberty street.

Mr. Louis Bush had the misfortune to have his foot badly crushed, it being caught under a large rock which he was endeavoring to move from its natural position in his lot fronting his residence.

Mr. John Harned spent Friday and Saturday in Oakland as the guest of his son, Mr. Joseph E. Harned. Mr. Harned, Sr., recently returned from Davenport, Iowa, where he spent the winter. His health is remarkable considering his advanced years, he being now past eighty-three.

Don't burn your old newspapers! Save them; also old wrapping paper, magazines, etc. The ladies of St Mark's wants them,—wants tons of them. Send a member of the society word that you have them and they will be sent for. It means money to them and it costs you nothing.

Oakland Lodge of Masons is having the walls of its lodge room decorated by Mr. George Lee, of Piedmont, W. Va. The color scheme being used by the artist in his work is symbolic of the Fraternity and the handsome appearance of the room is pleasing to those who assemble there semi-monthly.

Mr. Charles D. Smith, of Parsons, and F. E. Rathbun, of Piedmont, were in the city last Friday night when they attended the commencement exercises held in the opera house that evening. Both being ex-instructors in the Oakland school the exercises of the evening lent an additional interest to the visitors

A number of fine trout were caught in the Little Yough river near the railroad station in Oakland Monday. A string of three of the brook variety averaged ten inches each, being caught by Truman West, Jr. Mrs. F. G. Hyde, an ardent disciple of Isaak Walton, caught one which measured twelve inches.

The ladies of the Lutheran church will conduct an exchange on Saturday afternoon in the dining room adjoining W. G. Hinebaugh's restaurant on Second street The exchange will be open from 2 until 5 o'clock only. Colored Easter eggs will be on sale; also cakes, cookies, bread, both graham and wheat; pies, candy, etc.

Mr. Norman S. Heindel, of Gettysburg, employed for the present at Bond taking the place temporarily of Mr. Oliver Heyward, who has been ill for two weeks past, came to Oakland Saturday evening and spent Sunday in Oakland with friends. His arrival here was quite a surprise to his many friends, all of whom warmly welcomed him.

Mrs. F. J. Schroeder received a message Monday afternoon acquainting her with the fact of the serious illness of her father, Mr. Andrew Schuyler, of Lonaconing, for which place she left the following morning. Before her arrival at Lonaconing, however, Mr. Schulyer's death occurred. He was eighty-five years of age and is survived by his wife and a number of children.

Some Pages from Garrett County's Road Book.

In today's issue of The Republican, pages two and three, will be found extracts from the Road Book issued by direction of the Board of County Commissioners, along with illustrations and the manner and mode of constructing and using the splitlog road drag which has been recognized by the governments of nearly every state in the Union as one of the most successful and practical means of repairing and improving dirt roads. The simple manner of making the drag as well as the slight cost should appeal to every resident to provide himself with one and then use it when occasion requires. By doing this the roads would always be in perfect condition and at an expense so small that it is hardly worth considering. The bound copies of the book are now in the hands of the Commissioners' Clerk, Mr. A. G. Ross, and are the product of The Republican job printing department.

Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, who accompanied his family to Baltimore last Wednesday, has returned to Oakland. Mrs. Hamill and two children expect to remain in Baltimore several weeks visiting Mrs. Cushing.

Rev. L. B. Hensley was called to Beverly yesterday afternoon on account of the extreme illness of his little daughter. He will not return to Oakland before some time next week, hence there will be ne services in the Presbyterian church on Sunday.

Miss Almira Mitchell, aunt of Mr. John T. Mitchell, of Oakland, was brought to Dr. Hinebaugh's Home Sanatorium here Monday afternoon from Cumberland, where she has been in a hospital for several months past. Miss Mitchell is well remembered by many Oakland people when she resided here a number of years ago. She is now quite an invalid, having been stricken with paralysis.

Harry Davis has now open a fine line of spring and summer millinery. 3t

Mr. Bell White, son of Capt. James W. White, of District No. 8, was taken ill very suddenly last Friday and on Saturday was taken to the Hoffman Hospital at Keyser from his home near Gorman where he was operated upon for an obstruction of the intestines. Dr. Drinkwater, of Gorman, and Dr. J. E. Legge, of Oakland, performed the operation, which was successful, and Mr. White's many friends have every reason to believe that he will recover.

Mr. N. U. Bond, of Bond, was in the city one day last week when he made THE REPULICAN a friendly visit. Mr. Bond's connection with the new lumbering concern of which he was recently elected general manager, will not necessitate his removal from Garrett county as the business will be superintended by an assistant manager and Mr. Bond will remain a resident of this his adopted home. That he will not remove from this section is gratifying to his many friends throughout the county.

The Oakland Normal is exceedingly fortunate in securing Prof. F. S Matthews, of Cambridge, Mass., to deliver a series of two or three lectures early in May on familiar science subjects. Prof. Matthews is the author of "Familiar Flowers of Field and Garden," "Familiar Trees and their Leaves," "Familiar Features of the Roadside," "Field Book of Wild Birds and their Music," and also the principal drawings in Gray's New Manual of Botany, unquestionably the leading text book in the English language. He is the acknowledged authority on color in nature. Everybody should hear these lectures:

Mr. Thomas B. Wiley, of near Bittinger, brought a load of sixteen hundred pounds of maple sugar to Oakland Tuesday which he disposed of to the local merchants. Mr. Wiley is the first of the Garrett county sugar makers who has had the hardihood to attempt the trip to Oakland over the road leading from his home to the county seat with such a cargo of sugar, hence the price he received was somewhat in advance of that which will be paid later when the market becomes flooded. The great amount of sugar and syrup produced this season is far in advance of that for many years past, hence the price has dropped. Producers at Grantsville are disposing of their crop at six to seven cents per pound.

The mailing of spring catalogues from the Chicago mail order houses has broken all records for the postoffice there, and most other postoffice records in the country. The tenacles of these great mail order houses reach everywhere, and the great problem of the local merchant is how to meet the tremendous competition. It is a problem we would not attempt to solve, but it seems the best way to meet the situation is through the medium of intelligent advertising through the local paper, and right here the local paper can prove of great aid in assisting the merchant to raise the standard of his advertising by helping him prepare it in an attractive and appealing manner. In assisting the merchant to get results the publisher benefits not only the merchant and himself, but the entire town, in giving it a live, interesting paper that will attract trade and put a good base under the wall of home trade.—American Press.

NORTH GLADE.

John Friend, who had been sick but a few days, was buried at Glendale Sunday evening.

There is considerable sickness in this community at present.

Dory, son of J. A. Beckman, has been quite ill with pneumonia.

A child of George Beckman has pneumonia also, and we learn that Gilbert Broadwater is down with the same disease.

Elroy Rhodes, who has been very sick, is able to be out again.

Mrs. Lizzie O'Brien has been very poorly for some time, with seemingly no hopes of recovery.

Lloyd Winters has moved to Wildell, W. Va., where he is employed.

William Oss, of Oss' Mills, was visiting at J. D. Rhodes on Sunday

Miss Gussie Rhodes has been at home for a short time, but we fear her stay with us is limited.

Harold Moon will attend the Normal at Oakland and expects to enter the pedagogic profession.

We understand that Miss Pearl Rhodes will also attend Normal at Oakland.

G. H. Rodeheaver closed our school on Friday. He is a splendid teacher and a model young man and has been requested to teach for us next winter.

Miss Sallie Beckman closed the Meadow Mountain school with an exhibition, which was highly enjoyed.

Miss Alice Wolf closed her school at Glendale on Monday with a good entertainment in the evening.

Dr. Bolton, of Mt. Lake Park, held Quarterly meeting for us Sunday week ago. He preached two excellent sermons.

Our Sunday school has been reorganized, with the re-election of G. W. Moon as Superintendent, and Judge Fitzwater assistant; John Fitzwater, secretary, and Mrs. Estella Paugh, treasurer. The following teachers have been elected: Mrs. Junkins, Mrs. Chas. O'Brien, Mrs. Mellinger, Jas. I. O'Brien, H. C. Hersman, Wm. Brobst aud J. L. McRobie.

Notice to the Public.

Notice is hereby given to all parties not to harbor William Boyer, our relative, as we will not be responsible for any debts he may contract. We or either of us are prepared to care for said Boyer at our homes and have proposed to him that he live with us, but this he refuses to do.

EXTREMELY BAD WEATHER THE RULE

It Generally Storms In Washington on Inauguration Day.

Some doubt having been expressed concerning the accuracy of the statement that President Taft is the first Executive to take the oath of office and deliver his inaugural address inside the Capitol since Andrew Jackson, a careful examination of the records has been made and the assertion is shown to have been accurate.

While it is true that Mr. Taft is the first President to have been inaugurated inside of the Capitol in 76 years, Andrew Jackson was not sworn into office in the Senate Chamber. Jackson took the oath of office and delivered his second inaugural address in the old hall of the House of Representatives, which is now known as Statuary Hall. He did not take the oath in the old Senate Chamber, which is now the United States Supreme Court Building.

President Taft is therefore the first of the nation's Chief Executives to take the oath in the new Senate Chamber, which since December, 1859, has been used for the sittings of the upper branch of Congress.

Most of the inaugurations since Jackson's have "enjoyed" inclement weather.

The first two Presidents were inaugurated outside of Washington, and Thomas Jefferson was the first to be inducted into office in the new capital city. George Washington took the oath of office on Thursday, April 30, 1789, at Federal Hall, Nassau and Wall streets, New York. This building is now the United States Subtreasury, and the spot where Washington stood is marked with a heroic bronze statue of the first President by J. Q. A. Ward. Washington took the oath and delivered his second inaugural address Monday, March 4, 1793, in the Senate chamber at Congress Hall, Philadelphia. John Adams was sworn in and delivered his inaugural address on Saturday, March 4, 1797, in Congress Hall, Philadelphia.

Then the capital was permanently established at Washington and Jefferson was inaugurated there. The Capitol was only partially completed, there was no parade and the author of the Declaration of Independence rode on horseback to the Capitol to be sworn in in the hall of the old House of Representatives. A few friends accompanied him to and from the building. He took the oath Wednesday, March 4, 1801. The second inaugural of Jefferson, on Monday, March 4, 1805, was also conducted quietly and without any parade, the oath being administered and the inaugural address delivered in the hall of the House.

There has been some comment over the fact that President Roosevelt did not return to the White House with his successor, but went direct from the Capitol to his train. As early as the first inaugural of Jefferson, in 1801, John Adams established the precedent, not subsequently followed, of not even attending the inauguration of his successor. He absented himself altogether from the ceremonies.

James Madison toak the oath of office and delivered his inaugural address in the hall of the House on Saturday, March 4, 1809. He took the oath and delivered his second inaugural on Thursday, March 4, 1813, in the same chamber. James Monroe was inaugurated Tuesday, March 4, 1817, in the hall of the old House, and on Monday, March 5, 1821, he delivered his second inaugural in the same place. John Quincy Adams was inaugurated March 4, 1825, the first of the Presidents to step into office on a Friday, taking the oath in the House. His Vice-President was sworn into office in the old Senate, after which the procession of distinguished spectators walked from the Senate to the House for the inauguration of Adams. Monroe's second inaugural took place with three inches of snow on the ground from a storm which occurred the preceding Saturday.

Andrew Jackson was the first of the presidents to take the oath at the east front of the Capitol. He was the hero of the hour, and Washington was crowded with visitors as it had never been before. The ceremony took place Wednesday, March 4 1829, and his inaugural address was delivered from an open stand. However, when the date of his second inauguration — Monday, March 4, 1833—came, the weather was intensely cold and extremely inclement, the ground being covered with snow. Even "Old Hickory" did not care to undergo the exposure to the elements, and his second oath of office was administered in the hall of the House, where he delivered his inaugural.

When Saturday, March 4, 1847, came and Van Buren was about to be installed, the day proved to be clear, so that Van Buren delivered his address and took the oath of office from Chief Justice Taney on a stand erected around the eastern front of the Capitol. There was also good weather on Thursday, March 4, 1841, when William Henry Harrison delivered his address and took the oath on the eastern portico of the Capitol.

The day was raw and disagreeable when Polk was inaugurated on Tuesday, March 4, 1845, but, nevertheless, he took the oath and made his address from a stand on the east portico.

Zachary Taylor took the oath and delivered his address on Monday, March 5, 1849, on a stand east of the Capirol. The weather was good and the city was jammed with people. There had been a snowstorm on the previous Saturday, however, and snow fell directly after the inaugural. The inaugural of Franklin Pierce occurred Friday, March 4, 1853, during a snowstorm that lasted all day. However, Pierce took the oath from Taney and delivered his address on the east front of the Capitol.

Buchanan was inaugurated Wednesday, March 4, 1857, at the east front of the Capitol, on a bright and beautiful day. There was also good weather for the first inaugural of Lincoln, on Monday, March 5, 1861. He delivered his inaugural address from a large stand on the east front of the Capitol, and took the oath of office from Chief Justice Taney. Lincoln's second inaugural also took place outside the Capitol, on Saturday, March 4, 1865. Early in the morning of that day the tempestuous weather which had been prevailing for a week culminated in a severe wind and rainstorm. The sky was black with clouds, but about 11 o'clock fair weather began to appear, and by noon the storm was fairly spent. The sun broke through the clouds just before Lincoln began his inaugural address.

Grant's first inaugural took place Thursday, March 4, 1868, on the east front of the Capitol. It rained for a while, but toward noon the skies cleared and Grant went upon the platform to be sworn into office.

The day of the second Grant inaugural was Tuesday, March 4, 1873, will long be remember for its general disagreeableness and biting wind. The morning broke clear, but bitter cold, one of the coldest of the winter. But in spite of this, Grant took the oath and made his second inaugural address on the stand erected at the east portico.

Hayes was sworn in Monday, March 5, 1877, on the east front of the Capitol and there made his address. This was the second time that he had taken the oath of office within 48 hours. Those were the storm times of the Electoral Commission. The term of his predecessor had expired at the opening of Sunday. In order that there might be no doubt about the validity of his induction into office, Mr. Hayes first took the late oath on Saturday night at the White House. There was strong trace of snow and winds, but Hayes took the oath March 5 on the Capitol stand.

There was sunshine after a storm on Friday, March 5, 1881, when Garfield delivered his inaugural address on the east front of the Capitol. There was a snowstorm the night before, attended by thunder and lightning, and snow and sleet covered the ground the following morning.

Fine weather favored the first Cleveland inaugural on Wednesday, March 4, 1885, but the Harrison inaugural of Monday, March 4, 1889, took place in a cold rain, and the second Cleveland inaugural of Saturday, March 5, 1893, was cold and snowy, with a northwest gale. The first McKinley inauguration, Thursday, March 5, 1897, was clear, but his second induction into office on Monday, March 4, 1901, took place in a drenching rain. So clear was the weather, Saturday, March 4, 1905, when Roosevelt went into office that the day was characterized as one of the "usual Roosevelt luck." But when Mr. Taft went into office Thursday March 4, 1909, the weather was the worst on record. the city was stormbound and practically cut off from communication with most of the country; the streets were full of slush; the stands laden with snow; a strong gale blowing and the ceremonies had to be held in the Senate chamber, the transfer being made to the interior of the building for the first time since Jackson's second inaugural.

An interesting feature of the record of past inaugurals is the fact that the most of them have been on Mondays, this being due to the fact that March 4 has fallen on Sunday three times within a century and brought about three additions to the list of inaugural Mondays. All told there has been nine inaugurals on Mondays, three on Tuesdays, four on Wednesdays, six on Thursdays, three on Fridays and six on Saturdays, as follows:

Mondays—Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, Taylor, Lincoln, Hayes, Benjamin Harrison and McKinley.

Tuesdays—Monroe, Polk and Grant.

Wednesdays—Jefferson, Jackson, Buchanan and Cleveland.

Thursdays—Washington, Madison, Harrison, Grant, McKinley and Taft.

Fridays—Adams, Pierce and Garfield.

Saturdays—Adams, Madison, Nan Buren, Lincoln, Cleveland and Roosevelt.

The second inaugural of Monroe and the Taylor and Hayes inaugurals had to be held on Mondays because March 4 occurred on Sunday in each of those years.

If there were no change in the date, the inaugural of 1813 would occur on Monday, March 4, and the inaugural of 1917 on Monday, March 5, as March 4 will fall on Sunday eight years hence.

ROOSEVELT LIONS EASY

Mighty Hunter, in Chair Car, Can Drink Tea and Pot Fauna.

Foreglimpses of Theodore Roosevelt's experiences in the African hunting trip for which the former President has started, were given yesterday by Dana Estes, of Boston, who arrived on the steamship St. Louis, after traveling more than 25,000 miles in eight months. Estes is a friend of Roosevelt. The latter part of his globe trot was made over the trail shortly to be taken by the mighty hunter of Oyster Bay. He thinks Colonel Roosevelt will find hunting in East Africa "like shooting cows in a back yard." Estes intimates that the antelope are so tame that they won't even run from a locomotive whistle and that to avoid running over them the engineer has to stop the train, jump down and shoo them off the track.

Estes went from Mombasa to Narobi, near which Roosevelt will find his first great hunting field. He saw wild animals by tens of thousands fearless of the train as farmyard cattle. All the engines on the Uganda railroad are built in America. Estes was interested in the Kavarondi, all practical dress reformers, inasmuch as they wear none. He journeyed around Victoria Nyanza, the world's second lake in size, never crossed through the center, though navigated by thousand-ton steamers. From Uganda Estes went to Campella, the native capital, at Ripon Falls, head of the River Nile. He returned to Mombasa and visited the Zanzibar and Mozambique slave trade centers. Then from the Zambesi's mouth, he went inland to Rhodesia, where he visited the ancient mines from which John Hayes Hammond, the American expert, says from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 of gold was taken in days of old. Estes visited the Victoria Falls, which are twice as high as Niagara, but with less water. Men were harnessing the falls to work mines 700 miles away.

"I went south to the great diamond mines in Kimberly," said Estes, "and visited the battlefields of the Boer war. In Johannesberg I examined carefully the great gold mines of the Rand, now producing a third of the total gold output of the world. Last year from these mines $152,000,000 was taken out. Obtaining a cast of the original Cullinan diamond, I went to Pretoria and thence to the battlefields of Majuba Hill, Spion Kop, Ladysmith and to Durban." His African trip ended in Cape Colony.

"The outlook for the future in South Africa is good," Estes continued. "Today times are hard. This is due to the fact that it is a raw country. In the diamond fields I found the manager of the diamond syndicate to be a young American, son of one of the Argonauts of '49."

Estes had more exciting experiences in Europe than in Africa. He was arrested aboard ship in the Dalmatian port Cataro on suspicion of being a Servian spy.

"I had used my camera a great deal," said the traveler, "and had taken many views of the mountainous Dalmatian coast, including severel fortresses. I was taken before a military tribunal of three officers. My baggage was examined with extraordinary care and all my photographic films were seized. As soon as I could produce my passports and they were examined by the three officers, one of the inquisitors suddenly whispered the word 'Roosevelt!' The attitude of the two others changed in an instant. I received the most courteous treatment and was released. My photographic outfit was returned to me, but I was warned that I must not take any more photographs in Austrian territory.

Estes in Cetinje dined with Prince Nicolo of Montenegro, father of Queen Helena of Italy. All other members of the royal family and the entire Cabinet were present. Roosevelt and Taft were toasted by the Prince. On his travels Estes met in a castle on Lake Zug Frederick H. Page, formerly of Boston; in Castle Trevano, Lugano, Louis Lombard, once of New York, and in a castle in Genoa Enrico d'Albertis, traveler. He went to Boston as soon as he left the St. Louis.

Had Evidence in Hand.

South Australia's assembly witnessed a dramatic scene recently. During a debate the prime minister stated that some gamblers had cut off a comrade's finger because he had joined the salvation army. A member questioned the truth of this statement, when the prime minister astonished the house by dramatically stretching forth his hand with a bottle in it, exclaiming: "Here is the finger, and the deposition accompanying it."

Birds as Weather Prophets.

If birds in general peck at their feathers, wash themselves and fly to their nests, expect rain. Parrots and canaries dress their feathers and are wakeful the evening before a storm. If the peacock cries when he goes to roost, it is a sign of rain. Long and loud singing of robins in the morning denotes rain.

Mosquito's Happy Hunting Grounds.

PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON

Sunday School Lesson for April 11, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 12:1-11. Memory verse 7.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them."—Psalm 34:7.

TIME.—The Passover feast ("the days of unleavened bread," verse 3). April 1-8, A. D. 44. Herod had left his capital Caesarea, and was in Jerusalem for the feast.

PLACE.—Jerusalem—the fortress of Antonia, and the home of Mary, the mother of John Mark.

RULERS.—Herod Agrippa I., king of all Palestine, the realm of Herod the Great, his grandfather. He was 54 years old. Claudius, Roman emperor, A. D. 41-54.

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

During our last lesson and this from four to six years have elapsed. During that time have occurred the founding of the great Gentile church at Antioch and the calling thither of Barnabas from Jerusalem and Paul from Tarsus. The famine, and the famine relief sent to Jerusalem from Antioch.

V. 1—He "vexed" the church. The Greek means to torment, oppress, which is the meaning "vex" bore in old English. As a climax, "he killed James the brother of John with the sword," by beheading, "a mode of death regarded as very disgraceful among the Jews."—Expositor's Greek Testament.

V. 4—"When he had apprehended him." There had been some delay and difficulty in arresting Peter. "Probably Peter had concealed himself after the execution of James, but ventured forth to the feast relying on the sacredness of the season, and so gave Herod's officers opportunity to arrest him."—Rendall.

The power of prayer, that "was made without ceasing (stretched out, either in time or intensity—either ceaselessly or 'earnestly,' as the R. V. translates it) of the church unto God for him." The central meeting place (v. 12) was the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark—that Mary who wrote the gospel, and went on Paul's first missionary journey with his cousin Barnabas. "He may appear, nameless, in Mark 14:51."—Prof. H. P. Forbes. There the Christians, going in relays during the Passover, kept up a continual supplication for the release of their beloved leader, and, doubtless, that he might be upheld in his sufferings, and the cause of Christ prospered whatever might be the outcome.

Intercessory prayer—"How happy that in all extremities, and when every other expedient is precluded or unavailing, the greatest of all still remains!"—John Foster. We do not use this power half enough, or believe in it half as strongly as we should.

Peter was in prison till near the close of the Passover, "when Herod would have brought him forth."

Peter was not released earlier by an angel for the same reason that often causes a delay in the answer to prayers—to test our faith and strengthen our characters by the endurance of affliction. This waiting and the bearing of trouble, teach us patience, courage, hopefulness, cheerfulness and faith. What school has a nobler curriculum?

Peter was sleeping quietly, like David (Psa. 3:5) when Absalom and all his foes pursued him. "For so he giveth his beloved sleep," or "in their sleep" (Psa. 127:2.) It was in the last watch of the night, between three and six o'clock, for Peter was to be missed at three, when the guards were changed again. In this "darkest hour" which is just before the dawn" "angel of the Lord came upon him (stood by him)—a brilliant presence radiating light which filled the cell. Peter was sleeping so soundly that the light did not wake him, and the angel "smote Peter on the side." Keble in his poem on the subject, suggests that Peter may have been dreaming of his coming execution, and may have thought this stroke was his summons to it. What a blessed change! Probably the same stroke served also to strike off the chains that bound Peter to the soldiers, who were held in profound slumber.

V. 8—He was bidden: "Gird thyself," that is, bind his tunic (long undergarment) with the girdle; for sentals do not change their dress when they go to rest, but merely loose. Over this tunic he was to throw his "garment," the outer cloak or mantle. He was to bind on his "sandals," the wooden soles, "the shoes of the poor." Then he followed the angel, but "wist not" (thought, from the same root as wise) it was all a dream. "Peter's first credulity as to the occurrence witness to its reality."—Burrell.

Note that Peter was bidden to do what he could; it was not all done for him. Thus it was human muscle that rolled the stone from the grave of Lazarus. "In the heart of every miracle we find these human powers employed. That is the spiritual truth of the old proverb, that God helps those who help themselves."—Rev. H. Morrison.

The guards (wards) were asleep, were kept by supernatural means from preventing them. The first guard must have been placed outside the cell door and the second at the gate leading into the street. "The iron gate," perhaps of wood heavily plated with iron, though it was locked and barred, of course, opened seemingly of its own accord, probably moved by unseen angels. The angel led Peter "through one street," to give a feeling of reality, and then, because angels only help men only to the point where they can help themselves, he departed from him.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

Hunting the Hippopotamus

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

HIPPOPOTAMUS hunting affords variety for big game hunters in that it takes its devotees almost exclusively along rivers and lakes, a welcome change usually from the pursuit of the many animals generally frequenting the hot plains and rocky hills.

The hippopotamus is practically an aquatic animal, though a mammal, and Mr. Roosevelt can leave his expedition to pursue lions, elephants or antelopes temporarily while he embarks on a boat or canoe and voyages through the haunts of the hippo. But most hippo hunting is done from shore along the banks because of the increased danger resulting to the sportsmen from the use of boats. Hippos have a long list of victories over river and lake craft of many sizes and descriptions, attacking them with ferocity and effectiveness that stout timbers have failed to withstand.

The dangerous disposition of the East African hippos when assailed or angered is well illustrated by the accounts of their sensational assaults on railway locomotives on the line extending from Mombasa to Lake Victoria Nyanza. Engineers and railroad officials relate that hippos are stirred to towering rage by the snorting, puffing, whistling, fire glowing engines and that repeatedly they have come on the tracks near the Athi river station and charged boldly at the headlight. Only quick work of the engineer in stopping the train has averted serious accident, as a collision with a hippo would surely result in wrecked cars. His weight is as great as four tons and over, his thick skin alone sometimes tipping the scales at over 500 pounds when freshly removed. Sometimes about fifteen feet in length and standing from three to four feet high at the shoulder (of course exclusive of neck, trunk and head), the hippo is an obstacle that an avalanche might well hesitate to annoy; also it is told on the Uganda railway that when trains have stopped until the hippo has left the track the animal has charged at the engine and fought it, endeavoring to push it off the rails.

Probably the hippo would hate to learn it, but it is true that he is technically classed with pigs by various learned writers, though he has many radically different characteristics. At any rate, the ancient Egyptians began his humiliation by terming him the "river swine." The Arabs treated him very gently, naming him the "water buffalo." Hollanders know him as the "see kuh" (sea cow), and he received his present appellation, hippopotamus, from the Greeks. So it is seen that, widely known for centuries throughout the world, the hippo formerly must have had an unusually wide range of existence. And that is true. Although now found only in Africa, he anciently roamed over England, Italy, Palestine, etc., and his skeleton, strangely enough, has been found side by side with that of the reindeer in several places in England, though no farther north than Yorkshire.

In Uganda, along Mr. Roosevelt's route, are found the finest living specimens of the hippo "race." The many waterways and marshes provide them with ideal retreats and breeding and feeding places. Hunters on finding what looks like a probable feeding place camp near by and keep careful watch, for in regions where shooting has before occurred the beasts become very wary, keeping under water, with only their noses protruding among lily pads or grass. In wild districts grass and water plants (principally lotus and poppy) are their pabulum, but where cultivation occurs they greedily invade rice, millet, sugar and maize fields, doing incalculable damage not only by devouring, but by trampling. An idea of the prodigious amount of food a hippo can eat may be had when it is known that his stomach is often found to be eleven feet long when extended with food, holding five or six bushels. No one keeps boarding houses for hippos in the jungle.

What the hunter chiefly fears are the huge, cavernous jaws of the hippo, lined with ugly, enormous tusks and sharp incisor teeth. The tusks curve backward. With the crushing power of the jaws are combined the legs of monstrous weight. Any unfortunate on whom these bone and muscle pile drivers fairly descend will never rise again in one piece.

When the hippo is shot in the water care should be taken that the depth is shallow, for his specific gravity is so great that he immediately sinks to the bottom when freshly killed. After lying dead under water for about twenty-four hours the carcass rises, owing to gases generated in the stomach, unless the water is so deep that its pressure holds down the body.

Inexperienced white hunters sometimes lose the hippos slain in the water because the current carries the body downstream when it begins to rise. The natives, however, invariably drive spears tied to ropes into the monster and by tying the ropes to trees make certain of securing the carcass. However, the fact that hippos usually are found in quiet water outside the current, to relieve them of the labor of resisting the flow, renders this loss infrequent.

Forest venturers on whom their "lucky stars" have shone sometimes find hippo in a silly predicament. He frequently leaves his beloved stream to graze on herbage in the neighboring regions. He finds his way back to the water only by the scent of his tracks, and if rain falls while on this tour hippo's tracks are obliterated, the scent disappears, and he has no way of immediately finding his way back. Now he stands comparatively helpless against powerful rifles, as his best known mode of escape—sinking to the river bottom—is denied him. The ordinary hippo can stay under water about five minutes, but the veteran campaigner, wise in the ways of the huntsman, actually trains himself so that he can remain submerged for ten minutes. Then he rises for air under an overhanging bank or among thick reeds. The hippo's great specific gravity enables him to run along the bottom of a river with amazing speed, and the hunter must not underestimate his swimming ability, really phenomenal for so bulky a quadruped. Passengers on steamers on the upper reaches of the Nile state that their craft, going 10 knots (not merely land miles) an hour, have proved unable to overhaul a hippo and that full steam had to be crowded on before he was brought abreast.

His speed as a swimmer is a forcible illustration of the hippo's monstrous muscular energy, for he must overcome the great resistance his bulk offers to the water. But it should not be overlooked that in performing some of the aquatic feats with which he is accredited hippo probably had the aid of the current. A hippo could outdistance a pickerel—if his course was down the face of Victoria falls.

One of Sir Samuel Baker's steamers on the White Nile was charged by a hippo that smashed the paddle wheel and stove two yawning holes in its bottom with the head and tusks. Sir Samuel also tells of a hippo that lifted out of the water a heavy dugout (made from the trunk of a tree) that was twenty-seven feet long and filled with people. He also saw a herd of hippos attack twenty head of cattle swimming across the Nile and in wanton maliciousness drag many of them under water, never to appear again.

On a Uganda stream feeding Lake Choga two hippos and two crocodiles ingeniously destroyed two members of a hunting party encamped near by. The two men, having been shooting along the stream, came down to it at dusk to wash. They stood on the bank and failed to notice a full grown crocodile close at one side, nor in the dim light did they observe the eyes and nose of two hippos peeping above the water edge three or four yards out from the bank. Suddenly the crocodile gave a powerful sweep with his formidable tail, as resistless as though made of spring steel, and hurled both men, screaming in pain and horror, directly in front of the lurking hippos. Before aid could reach the unfortunates from the camp the hippos dragged them, broken and torn, beneath the turbid waters, to stamp their bodies deep into the slime and mud.

NATIVES DRAGGING OUT A HIPPOPOTAMUS.

Night, in fact, is invariably a time of action in the neighborhood of a hippo wallowing place, and native hunters effect many killings and captures after dark by the crude means they employ, though personal conflict with so imposing a foe is naturally avoided in the blackness that obscures his body. One of these native hippo slaying agencies consists of a weighted spear, often tipped with poison, which is suspended over a tree branch near the animal's tracks. The suspending cord is attached to stakes fixed on either side of the tracks. The animal coming along strikes the cord, and the stakes are uprooted, thus releasing the spear, which strikes deeply into the body or head of the hippo. This method is also used at times in the slaying of elephants. Pitfalls, after the fashion in India, are also used to secure hippos and rhinoceroses.

Through long, dark tunnels forced from the stream banks through reeds and brush the hippos make their way to the land vegetation, free from observation, and in these grewsome looking passageways the females frequently retreat with their young to escape danger.

The female hippos utter loud snorts and grunts when moving about, fearsome noises that can be heard a mile off, though most of the day they remain practically quiet, sleeping and yawning the time away on the water's surface or standing stupidly in herds on some sunny sand spit, with their heads resting on one another's backs because of the excessive weight of these hideous frontal "adornments." Thus the homily of bearing one another's burdens is not unknown to denizens of jungle and morass.

The same caution necessary in elephant hunting, as regards getting to windward of the animal, is required in tracking hippos. While the elephant can detect the presence of a human being many hundreds of yards away merely by his scent, it is doubtful if this scent is so keenly developed in the hippo. There is one advantage held by hippo pursuers which veterans do not fail to put to good use when necessary. I refer to the lowness of his eyes, which makes it difficult to see objects at any appreciable height. Consequently persons chased by one of them sometimes escape by climbing a tree and taking a carefully aimed shot at him as he goes lumbering by. Owing to this same peculiarity hippos will pass by a man perched on an ant hill or a hummock but a few yards away without seeing him if the person keeps still.

Keen observers have noted various peculiar propensities of hippos, among them the tendency among males to neglect their offspring. Bulls have frequently been seen to attack and maltreat their young. Then, too, they are habitual fighters among themselves at night, and a wounded hippo, whether injured by a fellow snorter or a bullet, is often attacked and abused by the other members of the herd.

Following is an extract from a famous African hunter's account of an East African native hippo chase, which illustrates the favorite method adopted by jungle inhabitants, whose ingenuity must remain unquestioned:

"We accompanied the natives on board of a huge raft made of reeds and logs and floated down the river on a moonlit night. The natives had spears or harpoons attached to long ropes, and at the rear of the raft canoes were kept in readiness.

"Soon a sound of waters cleaved by heavy bodies mingled with deep snorts came to our ears. We swept around a bend and were in the midst of a herd of hippopotamuses. At least a dozen of them there seemed to be disporting in the water, some spouting through their nostrils and yet others rolling in the mud and ooze. Just then the raft ran sheer against a huge beast, and a native poised his huge harpoon in his hand and drove it with all his force into the monster's back.

"The stricken beast, with a cry that scattered the remainder of the herd, dived like a stone for the bottom. In a moment he was going downstream at a rate that soon used up the line on the harpoon, and it was jerked out of the huntsman's hand, leaving the buoy attached to tell the course of his flight. Two of the natives launched and jumped into the canoe, I with them, and a few minutes of vigorous paddling enabled us to recover the buoy. The beast was still traveling too fast for us to haul in much line, but soon he slackened, and we knew he was coming up to breathe. Then the natives hauled on the line with frantic energy, propelling the canoe by this means alone, so that when his head emerged we were not far distant. As soon as he appeared the natives launched a couple of spears into his hide. Down he went like a bolt. Still he pursued his course downstream, and we followed him to repeat the same tactics over. Every time he rose he was wounded afresh, and a crimson stain on the water marked his course as well as the buoy. His rushes now became feebler, and we knew that the battle was nearly over. Once more he dived to rise no more. The natives paddled to shore and tied the rope to a tree, knowing full well that the river would give up its spoil in the morning when gases formed in his stomach and would raise him."

THE OAKLAND HIGH SCHOOL COMMENCEMENT

Second Annual Occasion Eminently Successful.

The second annual graduating exercises of the Oakland High School were held in the Opera House on Friday evening last.

Before the curtain rose at 8 o'clock every available chair was occupied and many were obliged to stand.

The stage was tastefully decorated with United States and Maryland flags and "O. H. S." pennants and potted plants.

The Board of School Commissioners occupied the lower right hand box and on the stage sat the Trustees of the Oakland schools, the ten members of the Faculty, the three graduates, County Superintendent Browning and the orator of the evening, Hon. Philip Willett.

That part of the program which preceded the address occupied one hour and twenty minutes and was rendered as published in these columns last week.

The Oakland orchestra gave four selections, one at the opening, two during the exercises and one at the close, which were much appreciated.

The opening and closing quartettes by Dr. Robinson, Mr. Naylor and the Misses Littman were well selected and encore showed they met with popular approval. The abilities of the singers in this quartette are too well known to Oakland people to admit of praise from us.

No music of the evening was more highly enjoyed than the violin solos by Dr. Robinson and by Mr. Herman Runten. Both were recalled the second time and that even did not seem to satisfy the audience.

Miss Ashby's solo met the most sanguine expectations of her friends as she possessses recognized musical talents. She, too, was recalled.

But the program centered around the Class of 1909 in whose honor the entertainment was given—the literary features of Part I being furnished by its members.

First came a carefully written and highly instructive essay on a timely topic and one of vast commercial importance to the American people, viz: "The Panama Canal," by Dean Cook Skinner. Mr. Skinner read in clear, distinct tones and the audience gave him close and appreciative attention.

Mark Sherman White's subject was "Knowledge is Power." While this is a somewhat abstract subject, one that can be properly handled only by careful thinking, Mr. White showed himself equal to the occasion and presented an excellent essay in a manner highly pleasing to the audience from first to last.

Miss Orpha Christina Ashby being the only lady of the class, rather more than the usual interest was manifested in her essay. Her subject was "The Power of Purpose." This essay was worthy in every way of presentation from the Commencement platform of the highest grade secondary schools and Miss Ashby's delivery of the same was equal in every respect to the essay itself.

We print the same in today's REPUBLICAN and next week will publish the essays by the gentlemen.

After the presentation of the diplomas by Supt Browning in some well chosen remarks in which he complimented the work of the schools, Principal Palmer introduced the Hon. Philip Willett, of Mt. Lake Park, formerly of London, England. While Mr. Willett announced no subject his thoughts were along the line of the relation of Education to Crime. He spoke from 9:25 to 10:20 and every thought and word was given the closest attention by every person in the audience and Mr. Willett proved himself in truth the hero of the hour. His masterful presentation of the horrors of the "Reign of Terror," his vivid pictures of social failures in high life, his flashes of wit, his inimitable humor, all combined to make this one of the best lectures ever delivered in Oakland and so popular was it that the school Board at once engaged Mr. Willett to lecture before the next annual Teachers' Institute. A synopsis of Mr. Willett's address appears herewith.

We congratulate those in charge on the excellent program rendered, every number proving itself indispensable and worthy of the occasion.

Miss Ashby's essay follows:

For centuries purpose has been filling the pages of history with marvelous facts, carving deep on the consciences of men and women monograms of peace and purity and tracing upon the canvas beauties of its potency. The age of today is demanding men and women of stability, who have a keen insight into the affairs of the day, and who can work reform and have that conviction and courage of conquering or dying.

To have a definite purpose in life is just as essential to the ultimate success of an individual as food is necessary for the sustenance of his body. Without a purpose man or woman is a drifting ship. Perhaps one of the saddest pages of history ever written is that which contains the record of one who in this life had no definite purpose; one who betrayed his country, and finally after a series of treacherous acts, died in the metropolis of the world in poverty and disgrace. The French maid of Orleans, Joan of Arc, after she heard of the wrongs and suffering that had befallen her country, set to work, keeping her purpose in view, and secured her way among the French soldiers and inspired the dispirited ones with new courage. She kindled a flame of enthusiasm among them that none could resist. But all about us the power of this invisible something we call purpose is manifest.

The tones of the old school bell in yonder tower that has called many within her walls to duty; the glistening dew drop; the rippling brook in the lonely forest; the mobile river in its onward course, all play important parts in the law of service. Even the flower that breathes its fragrance on the desert air, the echoing notes of a little songster, the tiny mound of the ant, have some lesson to teach or purpose to fulfill. Then should not we who have been placed in dominion over the earth, have at least as much purpose as the humblest of these? The pages of history are also aglow with examples.

A Huss could taste of the pangs of persecution and death and yet with composure breathe upon his enemies a benediction; a Luther could stand before a howling multitude and say, "Recant I cannot, and recant I will not," and Paul in the darkest hours of his persecution and affliction could whisper, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." These are the martyrs whose memories will glow more brightly as civilization becomes more enlightened. These are the men who, though dead, are still being crowned. The persecuted heretics of yesterday are the glorified martyrs of today. The apostle John was despised as an exile and a reproachful Galilean, but long after his enemies had sunk into oblivion it was the name of St. John that was found carved deep in the monuments of civilization. Then, ask the names of the great heroes of the earth and I will point to the ones who amid scorn and persecution stood alone. The many martyrs of the past who were scorned and ridiculed, today the children of that very generation who mobbed and reviled them are gathering up their scattered ashes to deposit them in the golden urn of our country's history.

Purpose in all its power manifests itself in many strange ways. Scattered through the pages of profane history we find records of strange happenings. We see the Greeks for ten long years hammering at the great bulwarks of Troy. We hear grand old Plato in all his glory resounding through the Seven Hilled City, "Carthage must be destroyed," while one, in later years, is, through mist and fog, even an unknown ocean, seen making his way to a new land. Could Alexander have conquered what he thought to be the world had he not seen far in the distance the great Egyptian Pyramids; or could Hannibal have crossed the snow-capped Alps had he not through the difficulties beheld the sun-kissed plains of Italy? Could Caesar have ever crossed the Rubicon or Washington the Delaware, if they had not fixed their stern gazes on the glorious victories beyond the perils at their feet? Could our "Declaration of Independence" have been valid if Lincoln had not signed that great document of freedom, "The Emancipation Proclamation?" Those who have left their names imperishable, have been men of iron will; men our nation values, but the conquerors, liberators and preservers of nations, have all been men of warlike mettle. Our heroes and martyrs who stood for right and justice are identified with those who live on in the hearts and minds of future generations. The men who illustrate the true value of our country are those who left home and occupation, comfort and kindred, and stood in the midst of battle. Loyal to purpose, there are thousands of uncrowned heroes whose influence upon humanity is associated with no mark of destruction, but whose noble purpose and sacrifice will ever have a place of importance in this nation's records. In grassy graves they sleep. "When the symbols they loved so well shall cover and spread over them, by day the flowers of red, white and blue, by night the constellated stars, while out of those graves there grows the better harvest of the nation and of the times to come."

What? You ask who is great? Only he is great who has rendered humanity the best, the truest and the noblest service. Is that nation great which has written its history in innumerable atrocities, or that has attained the pride of its bosom with the precious blood of mortals? Is that nation great within whose borders the craving greed for wealth and power has almost eclipsed the star of purity and justice? Ah! I fear lest in the great hurlyburly of this industrial age we may forget our purpose; lest we may forget the principles that cost the life blood of our fore-fathers; lest we may forget the teachings of Him who walked the lonely shores of Galilee! Oh! shall our fate be that of a Tyre or a Sidon?

"If drunk with sight of power we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe
Such boasting as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the law—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!"

Mr. Willett's address was as follows:

To be called upon to address an audience of this character, and to speak a word of advice and encouragement to the young people, who have this day achieved the first step in the great school of life, is to me an event of deep interest and concern, as I am sure it must be to all who see the great work that lies before the American people.

Upon the young people, in whose honor this audience is gathered, I would impress the importance of the occasion. Here are your friends and well-wishers, here are mother and father and brother and sister, who have looked forward to this event with undisguised concern and pardonable pride. Here are your teachers and instructors, who have watched over your studies and marked your progress with more care, anxiety and solicitude than they are ever likely to receive credit for.

Among the blessings that come to us through the institutions of free and enlightened government a wise and practical system of education must ever be regarded as among the greatest.

In the pioneer days of this great country, when the modern system of travel and communication were unknown, when the people were engaged in a strenuous battle for bare existence, when stout hearts and willing hands were bending all their energies to turning barren wastes and dense forests into fertile farms, there was some excuse for men to whom the treasures of science, art and philosophy recorded in the literature of the ancients and moderns was a closed and sealed book. But now the school-master is abroad and the time is close at hand when an un-educated American citizen will be an object of scorn and derision as he is fast becoming the object of pity and contempt. The benefits of education are no longer the privilege of the favored few; a wise and beneficient government has brought the stream of knowledge, through the public schools, to the door of all, the poor as well as the rich.

History shows that ignorance has ever been the victim of folly and weakness. Knowledge is power and the strongest safe-guard of the liberties of a nation is the intelectual development of its people. Ignorance is a breeder evil and the destroyer of moral and social progress. A nation may stand high on the intellectual thermometer of the world through the achievements of a few brilliant men, but all real and permanent progress must have its foundation in the mental and moral education of the masses. Ignorance of the masses in any country is always a menace to progress and prosperity. It is the prey of every political delusion and a source of weakness in a nation's hour of trial. It has ever been found a fertile field for the propaganda of discontent and revolution, and in every revolution ignorance is the power to be most feared and dreaded. History presents no more striking lesson of this truth than the conditions which preceded and the events that led up to the French Revolution; and to the student of history the French Revolution is a study in blood and carnage. It was the result of a century of oppression and enforced ignorance of the masses. The Court was licentious, frivolous and corrupt, the masses were impoverished, ignorant and oppressed. For years the people had been treated as beasts of burden, begging the right to toil and lifting their knotted hands, cringing supplicants to arrogance and wealth. Church and State, throne and altar, king and priest were in league against the people. It was the reign of the favorite, the sycophant and the pander. The substance of the people was filched from them by unjust laws and iniquitous taxation; the revenues of the country were squandered in shameful profligacy by the voluptuaries of the royal palace. The church was filled with hypocrites. In the Senate corruption held the highest place. The Courts of justice were venal and around the person of the king evolved the most abandoned courtizans that ever disgraced a royal court.

At the Tuilleries and at Versailles surrounded by the priceless treasures of art, gathered the pomp, splendor and beauty of that fated land. And there, under the very nose of royalty, under the peacock hangings of the royal closet, treason, sedition and intrigue plot and conspire. In the gilded banquet hall, enveloped in the golden gauze of wealth, sire and son, matron and maid join the mad whirl that leads to destruction and death. High carnival ran riot at the revels of the midnight masque. The ladies of the Court studied lewdness as a fine art, the poet of the licentious passions was the idol of the day and the painted and bedizened courtizans listened with eager ears to ribald attacks on the holy institutions of religion and matrimony, and with captivating smiles from behind their jeweled fans they encouraged the lewd and vulgar jest.

Such were the conditions, avocations and life of the ruling classes in Paris while France was in travail with spirit of revolt. Given up to libidinous passions and selfish pleasures they heard not the people's cry for bread and through the bastioned walls of the palace the groan and agony of the toiler could not penetrate. In those sad days fear and famine sat at the fireside of the poor. Many a father turned uneasily in his sleep and many a mother wept throughout the long and dreary nights as she thought of the fate of her daughter, torn from her arms at the order of the lord of the manor. But a terrible day of reckoning is at hand, and now the lull before the storm. The teaching of Mirabeau, Camile, Desmoulins, Vergniaud, Danton and Marat are bearing fruit. While the Assembly is discussing the Declaration of Rights of Man horrible tragic scenes are staining with blood the fair soil of France. Hark! the Carmagnole is coming! the Carmagnole, that wild and weird dance of the furies. Men, women and children, in silks, satin, tatters and rags are tramping through the slough of blood and dirt in the streets of Paris. And over all the land falls the awful shadow of the guillotine. The guillotine, that terrible engine of death which Charles Dickens says was made the popular theme of jests. It was a sure cure for the headache. It infallably prevented the hair from turning gray. It imparted a peculiar delicacy to the complexion. It was the national razor, which shaved so very close. Who kissed La Guillotine looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack. It was the sign of the regeneration of the human race. It superceded the Cross. Models of it were worn on the breast, from which the Cross was discarded. It was bowed down to and believed in where the Cross was denied.

It sheared off so many heads that the ground on which it stood rotten red with human blood. It hushed the eloquent, it struck down the powerful and abolished the beautiful and good. The men and women, who tried to stay the tide of bloodshed. Many of the leaders of the Jacobins, nearly all the leaders of the great Firondist party, Camile Demoulins, Vergniaud, Gaudet,, Danton and Robespeare the incorruptible, Marie Antoinette, Charlotte Corday and the and beautiful Madam Roland fell beneath its awful stroke. Madam Roland the Heloise of the 18th century. She was the angel of the cause she espoused, the soul of honor and the conscience of all who embraced it. She rode to the guillotine clad in white; her glossy hair hanging down to her girdle. With head erect and sparkling eyes she bared her beautiful throat to the cruel knife. She was the noblest victim of the cause in which she suffered. And Charlotte Corday, the poor peasant girl, who came from the provinces to slay Marat and the willingly laid down her life for the Revolution.

Those were truly the times to try men's souls. Ignorance was enthroned in every place of power and a brutal lust for blood seemed to hold possession of the soul of the nation. France seemed to regard the Revolution as some fiend incarnate, that could only be appeased by blood, and with hellish glee she brought the sacrifice in the blood of the best and noblest of her children.

But friends, I came not to harrow and vex your feelings with the story of of the Reign of Terror, and my excuse for refering to it even thus briefly is that it shows the menace and danger of ignorance, and by contrast marks the great blessings to be derived from our public school system.

It is my purpose tonight to point out, if I can, something of the influence of educatian on success in life. I know that in the present age the love of wealth and the mistaken ideas that everything must be subordinate to the getting of wealth; that man's every effort must be directed to that end, is fast becoming an alarming phase of our national life. The youth of the land are led to look upon all instruction merely as a means of obtaining wealth, and that time spent in acquiring knowledge that cannot be converted into money is frequently regarded as so much time lost. We are fast falling into the sad mistake of making money the measure of greatness and wealth the standard of success in life. So great and universal has this folly become among us that observant visitors to America seldom fail to remark that we are money mad; that the dollar sign is the standard by which we try every civic and social virtue. Wealth, they say, is the altar before which the American always stands uncovered. All is summed up in the words "How much did it cost?" "How much is it worth?"

Education is, or at least ought to be, the stepping-stone to success in life. Now comes the question—What is success? A thousand definitions of what constitutes success in life might be quoted from the oldest chroniclers to the latest pamphleteer, and each varying according to the standpoint from which life is viewed. But I will give you an ideal upon which we can all agree, it is this, that life is the most successful which reaches the highest development of moral and intellectual excellency and renders the most good to mankind. We must not be discouraged because this ideal seems beyond attainment. Every man is a success who does the best he can under the circumstances by which he is surrounded. A man may be poor and live in a hut, but if he is honest, industrious and courageous, if he does the work at hand with a will, if his life is warmed by love and charity towards others his life is a success though he may die not worth a penny. On the other hand a man by care and shrewdness may amass a fabulous fortune, but if his heart is chilled by avarice and the finer sensibilities and kindly impulses of nature touch him not, if his life is dominated by purely selfish motives, he may live in a mansion and revel in luxury but his life will be a failure. The man who shapes his life to be a benefit to mankind is sure of ultimate success, though failure may dog at his heels at every turn. And if to be a benefactor of mankind is to succeed in life then great wealth has never been necesary to success. Take the names that are associated with the progress of civilization in all ages, the men and women who have carried the torch of liberty and enlightment into the dark corners of the world and you will find they were never remarkable for great riches.

And now my young friends, graduates, be not lulled into the delusion that your education is finised, but rejoicing in the fact that you have this day acquired the key to all attainable knowledge. This comes to you, not as a favor but as the reward of toil and diligent study, and with it come the grave responsibilities of citizenship. Bear in mind that the destinies of America are molded in the schools of which you are graduates and that by virtue of your attainments to day you become potent factors in the future of your beloved country, with clear vision of the forces that make for happiness, law and liberty.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1909. NUMBER 7

LITTLE DOUBT CONCERNING NATURAL GAS FOR OAKLAND

Local People Have Responded to Desires of the Gas Company

Last Thursday morning this paper contained an article written in response to a desire on the part of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company to get an expression from the people of Oakland and vicinity upon the feasibility of introducing into the town natural gas to be supplied from the mains of the company which are lain along the banks of the Potomac river from near its source to Cumberland and through the George's Creek region, the plans of the gas company being held in abeyance until it was made evident that a sufficient number of consumers could be secured in warranting the company to tap its main at Gorman and lead the gas to Oakland through a six inch pipe, taking it from here west to Terra Alta and eastward to Mountain Lake Park, Loch Lynn Heights and Deer Park.

The gas company, through its representatives, Mr. J. D. Northrup, of Cumberland, and Mr. J. B. Cheuvront, of Lonaconing, stated that in the event users of gas to the number of six hundred in the towns above mentioned could be induced to sign the regular printed form of agreement furnished by the company then the work of laying the pipes from the main on the Potomac would begin.

The matter was taken in hand by the Board of Trade and at a meeting held on Wednesday night solicitors were appointed and on Thursday the work of making a canvass of the town was begun. While some property owners refused to sign the agreement the great majority were only too anxious and the result was that a large number of signed agreements were sent in to the gas company's representatives on Friday which num' has been added to daily ever since.

On Tuesday Mr. Cheuvront again visi[ted] Oakland in the interest of the prop[osi]n and in conversation with THE REPUBLICAN stated that in the entire district to be covered by the gas lines 250 agreements had been signed, which lacked 150 of the required number. In going over the figures it was made evident that the Oakland people in a large number of cases had signed agreements contemplating the use of gas in from one to three or four different buildings, whereas the intention of the company was that each individual building or consumer should sign the agreements. This being the case word was telephoned to a number of the leading spirits in the gas movement to whom Mr. Cheuvront explained the situation in detail, and in going over the contracts already signed it was made evident that an additional hundred or more could be secured. Mr. Cheuvront expressed himself as highly gratified with the interest taken by the Oakland people and all but guaranteed that gas would be brought here during the coming summer.

As another evidence of the interest being taken by the people of the town and by the gas company's representatives a called meeting of the Board of Trade will be held in the Council chamber this evening when the representatives of the gas company will be present and go into the details of the proposition more fully.

This morning Messrs. Northrup and Cheuvront came to Oakland and from here drove out to Allegany Heights at which point they will meet the engineers of the company who are engaged in laying out a new line for the gas pipes from Gorman to Oakland, hence the prospects for natural gas for Oakland are growing brighter each day.

ANNUAL LEVY FOR COUNTY PURPOSES BEING MADE

Board of County Commissioners Will Probably Complete Work Tomorrow.

Tuesday morning the Board of County Commissioners met for the purpose of making the annual levy for the county expeditures for the present year, all members of the Board being present and the probabilities are that the work of the Board insofar as the levy-laying work is concerned, will be completed tomorrow, when the Board will adjourn.

From present indications the rate for county purposes will be the same as last year, but the Commissioners hope that they will be enabled to lower the figure a trifle. No extraordinary expenses are to be met, so far as can be learned, and with the advance in the taxable basis of nearly $83,000 over that of last year the Commissioners feel inclined to think that a slight reduction in the rax rate will be possible.

FUNERAL OF MRS. ELEANOR J. DAVIS

Remains of One of Oakland's Most Estimable Ladies Interred Saturday

The funeral of Mrs. Eleanor J. Davis, wife of Rev. John M. Davis of Oakland, whose death occurred at her home in Oakland last Thursday morning, a notice of the sad event being published in these columns that morning, took place from St. Paul's M. E. church on Saturday afternoon last at 2.30 o'clock, the services being conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman, her pastor, who delivered a tribute to the memory of the deceased.

The church was well filled by the friends of the deceased and special music was furnished upon the occasion by the choir of the church. Following the services at the church the remains of Mrs. Davis were interred in the Oakland cemetery.

In his address, Rev. Workman among other things, said:

"Sister Eleanor Philson Davis, in whose memory this service is held, was born June 12th, 1836. She departed this life April 8th, 1909, her age was therefore, 72 years, 9 months and 26 days.

"She was married to John M. Davis March 4th, 1858, and for a little more than fifty-one years she proved herself to be a helpmeet indeed. Of this union three sons were born, all of whom lived to manhood; William, the second son, a faithful and promising minister of the Gospel, preceded his mother by a few years to the heavenly home; while Charles and John are here today, together with the bereaved husband and father to mourn their loss.

"I do not know that funeral eulogies are often very profitable, nor are they needful or even appropriate. For where a life has been lived for so many years in a community as has that of our dear sister, if that life has been such as to merit commendation, that fact is well known without a word from the officiating minister; and where such is not the case no word that may be said can change in reality that life, nor even the estimate of that life in the minds of the people. So it is not my purpose to make an extended or extravagant effort in that direction; but what I may say I shall feel is but a poor and imperfect expression of the universal esteem and appreciation in which our deceased sister was held by this entire community, and especially by this church of which she has been for so many years a member.

"Fifty one years ago she became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and continued in its fellowship until last Thursday morning, when she was transferred to the fellowship of the Church Triumphant. It would be needless for me to say that Sister Davis had been an active member of the Church, for all who knew anything of the history and progress of Methodism in Oakland know that she forms a very potent part in that history. Her husband has been in official relation with the church through all these years, having filled perhaps almost every office open to the laity of the Church; and in his church work as in every other work of his life she shared with him in its trials and triumphs. I am told that for more than 30 years her hands prepared the elements for the Holy Communion; when the church was to be renovated Sister Davis and Sister Townshend, who preceded her by a few months to the heavenly home, always took the leading part.

"But her activities were not confined to this line of work for her church, but in all of its activities she took a leading part. She was to be found at the bedside of the sick, she was ready to relieve the wants of the distressed, she found the home of the stranger who moved into the community, and extended the glad hand of welcome to them. Her home was always open to the servant of God and when 'the new preacher' with his family came they were always made comfortable in her home until the parsonage was ready to receive them so long as she was able to attend to the duties of the home. In short, as the Master said of the woman who ministered to Him at Bethany, 'She done what she could.'

"The deceased has suffered much during her life, but under it all she was upheld by a strong faith in God, and believed truely that 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' The cloud that had gathered about her during the last three years, obscured much in which she had often found delight; but it never became so heavy as to blot out of her mind the reverence which she has always had for the church and the forms of worship.

"Just as long as it could be done she insisted on being brought to the Sunday morning service, and only two weeks ago when, as I often did, I dropped in on Sunday afternoon to see her for a few minutes, when as was the custom in that Christian home, we knelt about the tamily altar to worship, while she had seemed to be unconscious of all that had been going on she made an effort to kneel with us in the service.

"No man ever had a more dutiful, faithful, sympathetic or loving wife than was Sister Davis. No children ever had a mother who was more devoted to the highest and best interests of her children than was she. Nor who would make greater sacrifice for their comfort. She was a blessing to the community in which she lived. She was an inspiration to the church to which she belonged. She enriched every life with she came into contact. She died as she lived; and beyond a doubt has gone to enjoy the reward which God has in reservation for His people.

Then as Isaac Watts has so beautifully said:

"Why do we mourn for dying friends
Or shake at deaths alarms;
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends,
To call them to his arms;
Are we not tending upward too,
As fast as time can move?
Nor should we wish the hours more slow
To keep us from our love."

"She'll not be a stranger there, for she knew well her Lord and Master here and from Him she will receive a right royal welcome. Then too, every one of those whom she loved tenderly here, are already there to receive her at her coming.

"I know that hearts that are here today can not but be sad; but this sadness is for our own loss that we sustain in her departure. I would not have it otherwise if I could, for ties that have been formed in the long ago and that for fifty one years, by reason of constant, loving and happy companionship have been strengthening, could not be severed without sorrow being felt. But faith calls us to the future, and in the midst of our grief and sadness we hear the soul cheering words of assurance, spoken by the Master himself; 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.' They are not dead, but only separated from us for a little while, and then if we have been faithful we shall go to join them on the other shore, there to enjoy forever their fellowship, under conditions that this world can not afford."

"To this community that without exception mourns the departure of this noble woman I would say emulate the good you could not but see in her. To the brother and sister that yet survives, let me say the old home circle, so broken up here, is rapidly forming yonder, and soon you shall go to make it complete. Be faithful. To the children and relatives of the deceased no more fitting counsel could be given than to serve God as she served him, and your reward will be everlasting life.

'To dear Brother Davis, I can but say be faithful to the God who through all the trials through which you have been called to pass, has sustained and upheld you, and it will not be long until you shall go to join your companion and other loved ones on the other shore."

WHEELING BUSINESS MEN TO VISIT HERE THURSDAY

Tradesmen of West Virginia's Metropolis on Tour Under Auspices B. of T.

The second annual trade excursion of Wheeling business men will be run under the auspices of the Board of Trade, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, April 20, 21 and 22, through Ohio and West Virginia and will stop at Oakland on Thusday next at 12:10 p. m.

The party will be made up of about sixty representatives of Wheeling's wholesale, banking, manufacturing and other interests and expect to make a friendly call on Oakland business men.

The object of the excursion is to cultivate closer relations between Wheeling houses and those with whom they do business in this section and to show Wheeling's interest in the trade with which the city has been favored for so many years.

The party does not plan to sell goods or to show goods, but simply to pay a social visit to Oakland, meet its merchants and other business men, and to show Wheeling's appreciation of the cordial trade relations now existing. It is hoped also to point still more strongly the advantages of all merchants on the route trading in the Wheeling market, which is unsurpassed in large stocks, fair prices and shipping facilities.

The party, which travels on the Baltimore & Ohio road, will occupy a special train of Pullmans and will remain in Oakland for an hour or more. Oakland people, it goes without saying, will show their hospitality to the visitors and will make their stay here a pleasant one.

Hobson Sees War.

Richmond Pearson Hobson, of Merrimac fame graduate of the Naval Academy in the class of 1889, and member of Congress spoke to the midshipmen at Annapolis Saturday night and told them that they must prepare themselves for war with Japan in a few years, unless this nation constructed such a fleet on the Pacific as would without question maintain control of the sea. He said trat a similar fleet on the Atlantic, to maintain the Monroe doctrine and repel aggressions of European powers, was equally important.

Miss Varina's Valentine.

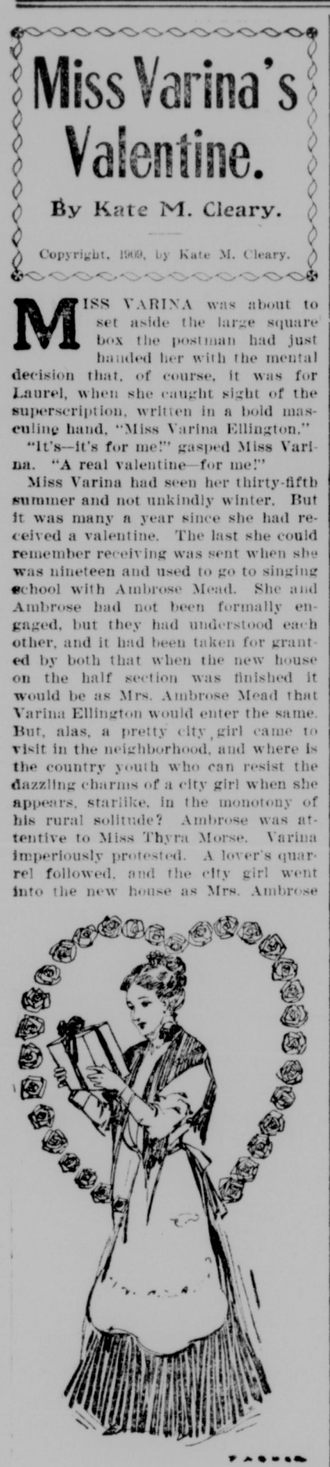
By Kate M. Cleary.

Copyright, 1909, by Kate M. Cleary.

MISS VARINA was about to set aside the large square box the postman had just handed her with the mental decision that, of course, it was for Laurel, when she caught sight of the superscription, written in a bold masculine hand, "Miss Varina Ellington."

"It's—it's for me!" gasped Miss Varina. "A real valentine—for me!"

Miss Varina had seen her thirty-fifth summer and not unkindly winter. But it was many a year since she had received a valentine. The last she could remember receiving was sent when she was nineteen and used to go to singing school with Ambrose Mead. She and Ambrose had not been formally engaged, but they had understood each other, and it had been taken for granted by both that when the new house on the half section was finished it would be as Mrs. Ambrose Mead that Varina Ellington would enter the same. But, alas, a pretty city girl came to visit in the neighborhood, and where is the country youth who can resist the dazzling charms of a city girl when she appears, starlike, in the monotony of his rural solitude? Ambrose was attentive to Miss Thyra Morse. Varina imperiously protested. A lover's quarrel followed, and the city girl went into the new house as Mrs. Ambrose



"IT'S—IT'S FOR ME!"

Mead. An indifferent housekeeper and an unsympathetic wife she proved to be. She was dead these five years now, and Ambrose, whose farm joined Miss Varina's own, had been getting along as best he could with such housekeepers as he could hire.

Miss Varina's thoughts now flew over all the town men she knew who might have sent her this valentine.

"No," she decided as her trembling fingers fumbled with the string. "There ain't one of them that thinks of me."

She held up the box and rapturously contemplated the glowing object before her. A cottage covered with pink roses overhung a blue satin lake. The inevitable verse on the inner page read:

My heart is thine.
If thine were mine,
Then would I know
All bliss divine!

"What is it, Aunt Varina? A valentine? Oh, how lovely! For me?"

A girl came eagerly forward. She was a very pretty girl.

"It's for me!" declared little Miss Varina. She was suffused in blushes—

"I NEVER KNEW YOU WERE A FLIRT!"

drowned in them. "You're not the only one, I guess, who can get valentines!"

"For you? Of course, you're young enough and pretty enough to get them by the dozen! Isn't it prefectly gorgeous? Who do you suppose sent it—the new minister?"

"No; I don't know as I ought to tell you. But if you look real close you'll see there's two initials written just under the verse on the fuside."

With an air of the most vivid interest Laurel lifted the rose covered cottage, the blue lake, the cupids, the violets, the hearts and the doves and bent eagerly over the inner page. She straightened up with a rallying cry and a deprecating pink finger pointed at her aunt's glowing countenance.

"Oh, Aunt Varina! I never knew you were a flirt! 'A. M.'—that's Ambrose Mead, of course. And to think that all the time he has been vowing Charlie must not marry until he was twenty-six, and you've been saying you would ignore me all the rest of my life if I married Charlie, that his uncle and my aunt have been carrying on this—this lively flirtation!" She broke off with a little despairing gesture. "I'm—I'm really astonished at you, Aunt Varina!"

"SOME ONE HAS SENT ME A VALENTINE."

Miss Varina, flustered, flattered, agitated, clasped and unclasped her hands in nervous ecstasy.

"But—but you're mistaken, Laurel! Indeed you are! It was because I detested—yes, detested—Ambrose Mead that I did not want you to marry his nephew. Why, we haven't spoken for fifteen years—not since he married that poor, shiftless, good for nothing—there! She's dead—the Lord forgive me for forgetting!"

"Well, all I can say," averred Laurel in a voice of brisk finality, "is that he has evidently kept you in his heart all this time. And—don't be too hard on the poor fellow, Aunt Varina!"

Miss Varina preened herself, patting the bow on her neck coquettishly.

"You're a good child," she murmured, her eyes on the wonderful object propped up on the cottage organ. "I may have been a little severe about you and Charlie, and if"—

But, deeming it best to let well enough alone, Laurel had slipped from the room.

Charlie Mead, a stalwart young fellow, coming home that night from his work in the town bank, found his uncle, a grim visaged, sad eyed man, brooding above a delicate piece of rice paper foamed over with forgetmenots. It was a trivial little thing, but pretty and in good taste.

"Charlie, look here! Some one has sent me a valentine."

"Well, why not, sir? I'm sure you're younger in heart and better looking by a long shot than many of the men to whom it is the custom, I am told, for girls to send valentines today! You can't expect to remain a widower always. The girls of Thomastown are not too dense"—

The elder man raised a perturbed face.

"No girl in Thomastown sent me this! There are initials signed"— He broke off in embarrassment.

"By Jove! So there are!"

"They are V. H. E." The young man looked interrogatively at his uncle. "I can't think of any one having those"—

"It might be Varina Hildegarde Ellington," said Ambrose Mead.

"Why, uncle! And after all your opposition to my marrying Laurel. What a concentrated fraud you are!"

"I—I may have been—a bit severe," the elder man admitted. "I—I fancied Miss Ellington disliked me very much on account of—well, that's past and gone now! But—I think, as a mere matter of neighborly courtesy, I ought to go over after supper and find out if that fine mare of her's is getting over its broken knee all right."

"NOR I, VARINA. IT WAS FATE."

Charlie grinned, vanished and executed a war dance in the hall.

"Better wear your most becoming gown tonight—the crimson cashmere," urged Laurel. "It is quite likely Mr. Mead will follow his valentine with a visit. I'll do the dishes."

And Mr. Mead, in best Sunday attire, did call. But hardly had Miss Varina received him in the parlor when a tall young man, whisking in at the back door, caught a slim maiden up to her arms in soapy water and carried her from the kitchen sink to the china closet. He laid a compelling hand over her lips.

"It won't be eavesdropping," he whispered, "to hear if we get out scot free about those valentines. It was the only way to get the antagonistic couple to release their grip on us—to set them thinking about a love affair of their own. Listen!"

This they heard through the sliding door between the china closet and dining room:

"If it were not for that valentine, Ambrose, I'd never"—

"Nor I, Varina. It was fate. Promise never again to refer to the means of our"—

"I promise. I, too, feel sensitive that it should have taken such a trifle to bring us together and make us understand how foolish we have been. We shall never mention valentine in our house! But—those young people we have been keeping apart—I'm willing to give them this house and the quarter section. Eh, dear?"

"Right! You'll turn my shack into a home—eh, dearest? Bless those children!"

The Dress of General Washington.

This great man was very particular about his personal appearance. He took pains with everything he did and showed off his clothes to advantage. There have been some interesting details of late given of what he wore from 1783 to 1793. The general writes himself in ordering his clothes, "Plain clothes with a gold or silver button if worn in genteel dress are all I desire." He imported his best clothes from England, but on ordinary occasions wore native homespun when out of uniform. For receptions he had a black velvet coat and breeches; the coat a long cutaway, square at the ends, having a small standing collar. There were ten breast buttons of silver or open work steel on the right breast, with blind buttonholes four inches long made of black silk braid on the opposite side. The coat had pocket flaps treated in the same way; also cuffs, which were five inches deep. There were two hip buttons at the back. This garment was very long waisted, and the top of the pocket flaps and hip buttons were on a line with the lowest of the breast buttons. It was lined with white satin, accompanied by black velvet breeches, with small buttons and knee buckles; the waistcoat of white or pearl colored satin, with a small standing collar and indented pocket flaps; a fine muslin shirt, with standing ruffles, repeated at the wrists, and the stock of the period; white silk stockings; low cut shoes, with large silver buckles. A dress sword, with silver hilt, suspended by a chain from a belt worn under the waistcoat and a linen stock completed the costume. He wore a bag wig, but not powder.

Goat Mutton.

"When you get a leg of mutton and find on trying to cook it that it seems likely never to get done, it's goat," says a local housekeeper.

"The only way of distinguishing kid from lamb or goat from mutton is that the goat flesh requires longer to cook and even when thoroughly done has a reddish appearance as though it were slightly rare. When properly prepared goat flesh is just as tender, just as nutritious as mutton and has exactly the same flavor. There is a prejudice against it, which, however, is entirely ill founded, and it is likely enough that this feeling is due more to the comic artists than to anybody else. In a comic picture representing the goat the old Billy is usually shown munching a tomato can or a straw hat or a lot of clothes stolen from the line, but as a fact the goat is just as particular about his food as the sheep, eats about the same kind and in spite of the comic artist in about the same quantity. The animal is just as cleanly as the sheep, and the only reason why the butchers do not openly avow their sales of goat meat is on account of the unfounded prejudice against it. It is sold under the name of mutton."—Exchange.

Science For Its Own Sake.

A prominent feature in Faraday's character was his absolute love of science for its own sake. He freely gave his discoveries to his world when he could easily have built up a colossal fortune upon them. He once told his friend, Professor Tyndall, that at a certain period of his career he had definitely to ask himself whether he should make wealth or science the object of his life. He could not serve both masters and was therefore compelled to choose between them. When preparing his well known memoir of the great master, the professor called to mind this conversation and asked leave to examine his accounts, and this is the conclusion the professor arrived at: Taking the duration of his life into account, this son of a blacksmith and apprentice to a bookbinder had to decide between a fortune of £150,000 on the one side and his unendowed science on the other. He chose the latter and died a poor man. But his was the glory of holding aloft among the nations the scientific name of England for a period of forty years.

BOWSER ASKS ADVICE

Seeks Wife's Counsel For Turning Blizzards Into Hot Waves.

REFERRED TO DRUG STORE.

Explains His Latest Idea and Is Insulted, While Mrs. Bowser and the Family Cat Sleep—Driven to Dead Line at Last.

[Copyright, 1909, by T. C. McClure.]

THE Bowser family had eaten dinner and returned to the sitting room and Mr. Bowser had smoked up half his cigar when Mrs. Bowser noticed that he was looking intently at the ceiling. There was evidence that his mind was grasping at some great problem, and after holding her breath for two or three minutes she asked:

"Has any one asked you to invest in a flying machine today?"

"Haven't seen anybody," he replied, with a start. "Have we got a book on chemistry in the house?"

"Not that I remember. You don't think of becoming a chemist, do you?"

"Look here, Mrs. Bowser, an idea came to me today as I looked out of the house and saw the blizzard raging and realized what suffering it meant to poor people. I've been working over it all the afternoon, and I'm getting it down pretty pat. If I can only carry it out I'll leave such a name behind me that Washington's won't be in it. The possibilities are so great that I am almost appalled."

"Did you see in the papers that goose eggs were worth 7 cents apiece?" she asked.

"No, I didn't. It's nothing to me whether they are worth 7 cents or $7 apiece. I'm not in the goose egg business."

"I didn't know but that was what you were going into."

"That's you to a dot! No matter how important the subject, you always try to give it a twist. I've got a tremendous idea, as I said, but I shall say no more about it to you. There are husbands who can look for encouragement from their wives, but I am not among the number."

"I'LL BE PLANTING STRING BEANS IN JANUARY."

"But if you will state the case I will give you all the encouragement I can. If you were going into goose eggs I should have had to tell you that a goose will eat 12 cents' worth of corn for every seven cent egg she lays. I thought you might not know it."

Mr. Bowser gave her a keen look and flushed up, but finally made up his mind that she intended no sarcasm and said:

"We have three months of winter in the north, don't we?"

"Yes."

"During the winter no crops can be raised. All live stock must be foddered. We must burn thousands of tons of coal and cords of wood to keep warm. A blizzard like this one comes along about once in so often, and then people actually perish of the cold. It costs the big cities hundreds of thousands of dollars to remove the snow. Winter is the pneumonia season. Thousands and thousands die of that disease. Do you follow me?"

"Yes."

"Well, suppose we didn't have any winter?"

"But you can't turn the north into the south, can you?"

"Suppose I could, so far as winter is concerned?"

"Then you would surely go down in history as the greatest man in the world."

"Now, that's the way to talk!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he rose up and walked about with his hands under his coattails. "Those are about the first encouraging words you ever said to me. Yes, let history get ready to do me justice, and I propose to make a few million dollars on the side at the same time."

"That will be nice. You spoke about a work on chemistry. Has your idea anything to do with chemistry?"

"It has everything, my dear. Every winter storm comes from the west and north, doesn't it?"

"I think so."

"The cold comes in on us mostly from Hudson bay. A blizzard starts in that icy region and sweeps clear to the Atlantic ocean unchecked. Why not check it? Why not hold it on the edge of the United States? Why not have our snow in the shape of warm and refreshing rains? In fact, why not keep our temperature at September all the year round?"

"But how can any human agency accomplish this?" asked Mrs. Bowser, with a doubting look on her face.

"There's where the idea comes in, my dear—that's where Bowser appears on the stage. My first idea was to string a line of coal stoves across the country about ten feet apart and keep the atmosphere so warm that a cold wave would melt on striking it, but after figuring the cost I gave it up. It would take 3,000,000 stoves and 10,000,000 tons of coal, to say nothing of a million men to run the stoves."

"It was a wise move on your part to figure on the cost before carrying the idea too far."

Asks For Advice.

"Oh, I've got an ounce or two of brains in my head! I'm not making any plunges. I abandoned the coal stoves, but not the idea. If left to you, what would you say would take their place?"

"I haven't the least idea."

"Mrs. Bowser, I own up to having held some foolish ideas and to having made some bad bargains, but this time I have struck it—struck it for fame and millions. It's the greatest, grandest idea that was ever conceived in the human brain, and Bowser is the man."

"Please hurry up and tell me what it is," replied Mrs. Bowser, who appeared considerably excited.

"Those cold waves must be met and stopped. They must be turned into warm waves. There must be some sort of chemical compound that can be fired into the air and exploded and do the business. The plan is to station men five miles apart and on the appearance of a cold wave begin the shooting and turn it into a balmy breeze. No more blizzards, no more cold waves, no more snowdrifts. Why, a ton of coal will last us all winter, and I'll be planting string beans in January! I've got the idea, as you see. All I want now is to find out just what sort of chemical compound is needed and the cost of the same.

"Most certainly I shall neither take in Uncle Sam nor the Standard Oil company. I pay all the expense and reap all the profits. Farmers and others must come down so much per capita. Any farmer who won't pay a reasonable amount to have summer all the year round will come to grief. I'll let a blizzard slip in on his farm and freeze him up as tight as a drum."

"Shall we get pencil and paper and figure the probable cost?"

"No. Let the cost take care of itself. The income is bound to exceed the cost five times over. The only thing is to find out what chemical to use."

"Don't you think our druggist could tell you?"

"Good Lord, but what an ass I am! Of course he can. It won't take him a minute. You sit right still while I run over to the store and have a little talk with him. When I come back we may do a little figuring. If any one should happen to come in, mum is the word. I wouldn't have you give away the idea for a million dollars."

Rebuffed by the Druggist.

Mrs. Bowser felt a bit conscience stricken when he had left the house, but at the same time she realized that heroic measures were needed. The family druggist had never hesitated to give Mr. Bowser his opinion on things, and he would not hesitate to do it in this case.

Half an hour went past, then an hour, then two. Then Mrs. Bowser arose and turned down the gas and went upstairs to bed.

Mr. Bowser had told his story to the druggist while the latter was putting up a bottle of cough sirup. He had been listened to with close attention, and when the story was concluded and he had licked the label on to the bottle he quietly answered:

"Sawdust will do it, Bowser."

"But how will sawdust operate on the weather?"

"It won't. It will operate on your head. Fire it into your ear, a whole ton of it!"

And while Mrs. Bowser slept and the family cat dreamed and the blizzard raged Mr. Bowser was walking up and down the street through the driving snow and muttering to himself:

"This is the limit! That woman has driven me to the dead line at last, and divorce follows!" M. QUAD.

A NATIONAL PERIL.

Consumption of Liquor in America Is Appalling.

The wine product of the world is now four billion gallons annually, of which the United States produces 50,000,000 gallons. In addition to this we produce more than 150,000,000 gallons of fermented liquor and distilled spirits and import 18,000,000 gallons more. We consume two billion gallons of spirituous and malt liquors and wine annually. In New York city alone more than a million dollars a month is paid for license to sell liquor by the 10,000 hotels, saloons and clubs which dispense it. The acreage of grapes for wine production in the United States is steadily growing and is now 350,000. In these vineyards, with their incident wine cellars, plants, warehouses, stock, etc., $100,000,000 capital is invested. Remember, this is for wine alone. Last year the federal government's revenue from liquor taxes was about $270,000,000. These are staggering figures and they indicate that the consumption of liquor is not decreasing in our country. None can estimate the influence of this gigantic traffic upon our national, state and municipal politics and our homes and social life. Yet there is an awakening and protest in nearly every state of the union, in which men are joining irrespective of political affiliations. Those who are financially interested in the liquor business are viewing the movement with alarm and evidences of a great battle in the near future seem abundant.

The lips of a nation are defiled by streams which flow from any fountains of uncleanness; and surely the streams of strong drink in our own country, carrying on their surface hundreds of thousands of men to the depths of human degradation and the sewers of death, are contaminating wherever they are running. The morality of a nation starves when that nation feeds its finances upon any baneful sin. The innocent suffer with the guilty and are forced to pay tribute money when vice compels the support of institutions created through vice and crime.

Isaiah knew that the ruinous root of the godless spirit of his age was drunkenness, and hence he thundered against it. He knew the effect of intemperance and its kindred sins upon the tone of the nation—making the heart fat, the ears heavy and the eyes blind to truth and beauty. America has not yet, thank God, become unsound as was the Israel condemned by Isaiah; but eternal vigilance against the encroachments of the forces of rum is the price of our liberty. The Ephraimites gave a mocking answer to Isaiah and refused to listen to Jehovah's word through the prophet. The nature of strong drink has not changed and the warning is as much needed to-day as it was when the drunkards of Ephraim "erred in vision and stumbled in judgment."

A GLORIOUS VICTORY.

Ohio Stands True to Her Fight on the Saloon.

Ohio, where the Anti-Saloon league had its start, is not to be outdone by states where the crusade against the saloon is younger. If Indiana and Illinois have a county opposition law, so has she, and her people are using the mighty weapon which has been put into their hands. On September 29 12 counties voted on the local option question and every one went "dry." Three hundred and ninety saloons which have enjoyed the right of fattening off the wealth of the people were abolished and must close their doors on the first of the year. Sixteen counties have thus far voted on the question under the provisions of this new law, and every one of them has voted right. There is no sign that the "wave of fanaticism" is abating in Ohio.

Prohibition a Success in the South.

The chief of police of Atlanta states that during the first six months of prohibition it has cost $5,000 less than usual to run his department, and that there has been "general good order and fewer complaints for want of necessaries of life."

Of similar interest is the report of the chief of police of Birmingham, Alabama, who recently telegraphed the following reply to a request for information from Houston, Tex.:

"Decreased arrests, general crime 33 per cent; drunkenness decreased 80 per cent.; building increased 25 per cent.; prisoners in county jail, one-half number of one year ago. Prohibition is prohibiting."

Wine-Drinking on Decrease in England

As a slight indication of the great social revolution which has been taking place in the drinking customs in England since the early wine-drinking days, may be cited the fact stated by the earl of Bessborough, in presiding at the annual meeting of the Gordons hotels at the Hotel Metropole, in London, recently. There was no doubt, he said, that the wine bill of the average hotel visitor had decreased for some time past, and was continuing to decrease. Compared with ten years ago the company's receipts from the sale of wines had fallen 50 per cent. in value, the greater part of the decrease having occurred in the last two or three years.

Justice Must Replace Selfishness In Politics.

By the Rev. Dr. GEORGE H. FERRIS of Philadelphia.

JUSTICE says that idealism cannot be kept out of politics. Justice says that sympathy cannot be kept out of trade. Justice stands over the clash and scramble of our life, crying that society is not war, but brotherhood.

There are men in our land who cannot be touched by the law who yet have been coming into violent conflict with the executive forces of government. Their methods of business are not illegal, but unjust. They well know that NO POWER ON EARTH CAN TOUCH THEM if they wish to loan a member of the United States senate $50,000 to buy a newspaper.

Take that modern political product called the machine. We know only too well how impossible it is for the law to find it. IT KILLS PATRIOTISM by demanding a reward for everything it does for society. It turns an election from an open consideration of principles into a vile scramble for spoils. It demands of every follower that he put fealty to his party above love for his city. It diverts taxes into PRIVATE CHANNELS by a system of underground reprisals and secret tyranny. It shuts the door of advancement to honor, to integrity, to liberty. It creates an army of idle men who are slowly inducted into fanciful offices, where they have NOTHING TO DO BUT TO DRAW THEIR PAY. It loads the community with ill managed utilities that find it necessary to recover from the people the sums they have paid in bribery for franchises. All these and a hundred other things it does. And yet the law will not touch it.

SO THERE IS SWEEPING OVER OUR LAND A GREAT WAVE OF JUSTICE. IT DEMANDS THAT BUSINESS PURIFY ITSELF WITHOUT WAITING FOR THE LAW. IT DEMANDS THAT LITERATURE CLEAN HOUSE AND DROP ITS MERCENARY IDEAL. IT DEMANDS THAT THE NEWSPAPERS GUARD THEIR COLUMNS AND ADOPT HIGHER STANDARDS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS. IT DEMANDS THAT THE POLITICIAN WHO SHOUTS SO VOCIFEROUSLY FOR THE FLAG CEASE BETRAYING THE LAND WITH A KISS. IT DEMANDS THAT THE CHURCH TAKE AN INTEREST IN THESE THINGS AND BE NOT SATISFIED WITH A RIGHTEOUSNESS THAT ENDS IN PSALM SINGING AND PRAYER MEETINGS.

It does more. IT WARNS US. It predicts that unless our selfishness is overcome by some power MIGHTIER THAN SELFISHNESS a calamity awaits us. We all know what that mightier power it. It is found in that little word "JUSTICE."

American Boys Are Becoming "Sissified."

By Dr. GRANVILLE STANLEY HALL, President of Clark University.

MORE MASCULINITY IS NEEDED IN THE SCHOOLHOUSE. THERE IS SOMETHING FUNDAMENTALLY WRONG WITH A BOY IN HIS TEENS WHEN HE IS "A LITTLE GENTLEMAN." NORMALLY HE SHOULD BE A BARBARIAN, AND A GOOD CUDGELING PROMOTES DEVELOPMENT OF CHARACTER.

More men should teach the young idea. At present 76 per cent of the teachers are women, and many boys go through school without coming in contact with a man. The result of too much women is that the boy becomes "SISSIFIED" AND DOMESTICATED. Boys are PETTED TOO MUCH. They should have roughhouse and boisterousness. These beget aggressiveness and not timidity, as the system now does.

Religion Is Not of Divine Origin.

By Professor GEORGE B. FOSTER of the University of Chicago Divinity School.

RELIGION is not of divine or miraculous origin. It is not a religion from a god, but AN ACHIEVEMENT OF MAN, who created his own gods in ancient times in order that he might have them to help him in his DEFENSELESSNESS AND IGNORANCE, to aid him in conquering his foes and to dispel the darkness of his future and the fear of death.

MORE AND MORE PEOPLE ARE GIVING UP THE IDEA THAT THEIR RELIGION IS SOMETHING HANDED DOWN TO THEM FROM A DIVINE SOURCE. THEY ARE COMING TO SEE THAT THEIR RELIGION IS JUST AS GOOD AS AND BETTER THAN IF IT HAD BEEN GIVEN TO THEM WITHOUT THE WORK OF HUMAN AGENCIES.

Consequently religion is on a more rational basis, as people are CULTIVATING IT just as they cultivate music, language, science and morality.

Charity, the Love of Man For His Fellow Man.

By Bishop SAMUEL FALLOWS of Chicago.

CHARITY IS LOVE TO MAN IN ALL ITS VARIED AND MULTIPLIED FORMS. BENEVOLENCE IS COMMON TO THE CREATOR AND HIS CREATURES, DIFFERING ONLY IN DEGREE, AND INCLUDES HUMANITY.

God has the knowledge and the power as well as the will to do good. Man often has the will to do good without having the power to carry it into effect. Humanity belongs to man only. Love is God's essence and streams from him as light from its source. Charity is love manifested to man as man and therefore, like humanity, belongs to man only.

There can be no love for God without love for man, but charity must be regarded as the LOVE OF MAN FOR HIS FELLOW MAN, beginning with the narrow circles of his home and increasing in ever widening circles of affection until the whole of humanity is embraced within its infolding arms.

Charity is spontaneous in its giving. It gives because it CANNOT HELP GIVING. It is its nature to give.

CHARITY IS LIKE THE CIRCLING SUN, WHICH CANNOT HELP SHINING, BUT SCATTERS ITS BLESSINGS OF LIGHT AND HEAT UPON ALL. IT IS LIKE THE AROMATIC PLANT, WHICH CANNOT HELP DIFFUSING ITS FRAGRANCE. IT IS LIKE THE BLUSHING ROSE, WHICH, STRIVE AS IT MAY, CANNOT HIDE ITS LOVELINESS.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Stung.

"Ah, Dian's kiss
Gave not the bliss,
I hold divine!
Come, let me be
Your honey-bee,
My Valentine!

"And let me sip
From off thy lip
The nectared wine—
The honied sweet,
The joy complete,
My Valentine!

"Bid Eros flee,
Let Hymen be
Affection's sign
Forever more
Without our door,
My Valentine!

"Where Dryads be
Come dwell with me
Beneath the pine.
Ah, far from strife
Be mine, my wife,
My Valentine!"

* * *

"If you will be
My bee," said she
"O, Valentine,
I'll be for life
Your willing wife,
Your columbine!

"But this I say:
That every day
My bee must shine,
Must hustle fleet
To gather sweet,
O, Valentine!

"Have you a hive
Along the drive
Beneath the pine?
No drone for me,
My honey-bee,
O, Valentine!"

* * *

His head was hung
Said he: "I'm stung!"
And down the line
He trudged his way
And lost that day
His Valentine!

And dressed you in those fussy clothes!
Ah, I must call them dreams of lace
And tell in raptures of thy face,
My lady!

Oh, gallant knight, go cut your hair!
Those socks you sport must be a care!
And such a nasty looking sword—
I'll bet you made it from a board!

What rooster wore that plume? O, say,
Cut out that mushy talk to-day!
Of course she loves you! That's the thing

My knighty!

Say! You get married! "DO IT NOW."
Go keep some chickens and a cow!
Yes, fix it up and do it right—
I've got to hurry home to-night,

Now, there's a wedding fixed, by gum!
I guess that's beating Cupid, SOME!
I'm off through sleeting snow and rain
To catch that fast Glen Ellyn train!

CONSERVATION OF FORESTS

Work of Germany and the United States Compared.

Germany faced the same great timber supply problem early in the nineteenth century that the United States faces today and in solving it developed heavy producing, and well administered forests which are models for the rest of the world.

A study of the systems of forest management and wood utilization in the two countries offer many interesting comparisons. The United States takes 260 cubic feet per capita annually from the forests; Germany uses but 37. In other words, this country is already using seven times as much timber per capita as is Germany. American forests are now producing not more than 12 cubic feet per acre; German forests are producing 48 cubic feet per acre annually. Germany has reduced waste and consumption and increased production.

The United States has as rapidly growing trees and as good soil as Germany, and foresters say it is reasonable to think that this country will be just as successful as the European country in high per acre production when every owner of timberland gets down to proper conservation and development of of his forest property. It is known that the United States must continue in the future, as in the past, to rely upon its own forests for the great bulk of wood which is used. Despite the the introdution of many substitutes, it is not possible to conceive the time when it will be practicable to do without wood for many uses. Granting this, the foresters say, it follows that as a nation and as individual citizens everything possible must be done to put the forest land of this country upon a pemanent productive basis.

The ultimate aim must be to cut no more from forests than they produce each year, and to make their yearly growth equal to the needs of the people. As in Germany, forest conservation in this country means just two things, first the fullest possible utilization of the present supply of timber, which will make it last longer; and second, the handling of forest lands in such a way that succeeding crops of timber will be secured.

THE VITAT ISSUE.

The Democratic party leaders of this state by formal vote have declared the suffrage amendment to be the vital issue of the campaign. Very well, a issue clearly stated can be clearly fought. Heretofore, let the voter remember, the party leaders have refrained from such a sweeping declaration. It has been an issue, but not the vital issue. As inevitably as the course of fate the buncombe policy has woven its meshes about the Democrats until it has become the rigid and absolute policy of the party. The city Democrats wriggled and dodged, dodged and wriggled. They have now placed the amendment above the ticket. They have sworn allegiance to it as the one supreme and necessary condition for Democratic success and Democratic life.

Let the voter mark the emphasis placed upon the amendment. It is officially declared to be the vital issue. This means that there is no other vital issue. This means that the candidates are subordinated to the success of the amendment. The tail to the party kite has become more important than the kite itself. For the first time in its history the Democratic party in Maryland has declared that its very life, its future existence as a party capable of registering success, is dependent upon the elimination of a section of the voters of the state. For the first time it has gone on record that only by the supremacy of the disfranchisement issue can the party hope to hold its own.

What does this vital issue mean to the interests of the state in general? It means, as has been repeatedly said, the subordination of the political independence of the voters to the shackles of a party. The people of Maryland are called upon to face the disfranchisement issue as the issue upon which the party pretends its future destinies rest. This is all pretense. The Democratic party is not dependent upon the elimination of the colored voter and the control of the foreign-born voter save for making the wresting of the state from its control forever impossible. Is this an issue of vital importance to the voters of the state? Certainly it is vital in the sense of being an issue vitally important for them to overwhelm. The Democrats are playing their disfranchisement card as a trump card, but their bluff will be called. The one trump card in the next campaign will be decent policies and unfettered franchise and the preservation of the balance of power in the hands of the voters. This will be held by the Republicans.

HELP! HELP!

From Boston comes the wireless signal "C. Q. D." which being interpreted, meaneth "Help!" One hundred thousand women are in danger—in danger of becoming old maids. The problem is, How can they be saved from such a fate? The news is not only likely to bring men to the rescue, but it is likely to make them take to the womanless woods in some faraway country where the spinsters do not trouble and the weary are at rest. Help is needed, but there is no help in sight.

The cowardly men not coming to the relief of the 100,000 spinsters, the Women's Massachusetts Homestead Association has been formed to see if something cannot be done. Its promoters propose to buy tracts of land and establish little colonies for single ladies unattached where each one can have her own plot of ground, her own little vegetable patch, flower garden, and her own vine and fig tree. The Homesteaders point out that the colonists could support themselves by raising flowers, herbs, plants, mushrooms, strawberries, vegetables, squabs, chickens, bees and pigs. This sounds all right except the pigs. Now, we all know that "pigs is pigs," and pigs are hardly ladylike. So we respectfully advise that pigs be scratched from the list.

If the number of old maids and widows continues to increase, and the number of men continues to decrease in proportion, we can imagine in the year 1940 that New England will be one vast stretch of old-maid colonies. We can see the trains running through miles of flowers, plants, herbs and strawberries; we can see the whole acres of cats and poodle dogs spread out over the landscape; the steam raising from a million teapots, and the hum of gossip sounding like one vast talk factory from Long Island Sound to Maine. It would be a real "No Man's Land," and brave would be the man who would venture to land there.

This is a great project, a project worthy of the great mind of New England—one that might have had its origin in the collosal brain of the immortal (see catalogue) H. Cabot Lodge.

But it does not commend itself as a complete remedy. An old maid is a one-generation affair, and if New England is going to give state aid to the encouragement of old maids, it may as well prepare either to welcome any sort of old immigrant that comes along or else fix to put up the shutters and go out of business about the year 2000.

We may be wrong, but it appears to us that the only real and sufficient remedy for an old maid is for her to get married. This may seem shocking to the refined sensibilities of the Boston spinisters—perhaps they never thought of anything so crude and common; perhaps marriage is not "good form" in that section. If so, we beg their pardon for having mentioned the subject in the presence of ladies. But here in Baltimore and all through the south it is satisfaction. Of course, we have some old maids here, but not enough to constitute a "problem." And those that are here are never far removed from the marriage line and can get married any time they choose. But 100,000 New England spinisters is appalling. It is a problem and a danger that only a Roosevelt would dare tackle, and then he would be likely to get badly scratched by hatpins, hairpins and safeties.—Baltimore Sun.

WHAT IS A DEMOCRAT?

Because some members of the minority in the house at Washington are supporting the protective principle there is renewed interest in the time-worn question, "What is a Democrat?" The theory of some Democratic organs and leaders appears to be that a Democrat necessarily is a man who will vote against any and every proposition advocated by the Republican party. Unfortunately if this were so there must be many occasions when Democrats, for the poor privilege of maintaining party regularity, would be placed in positions of actual hostility to legislation that is essential to proper conduct of the government or the defense of the national honor, and these are absurdities to which no sensible Democrat will go, nor will his party either. Why, then, should a Democratic representative in congress sent there to carry out the known wishes of his constituency and with a thorough comprehension of their needs, stulify himself and violate the dictates of his own conscience by opposing a manifestly beneficial piece of legislation simply because it is fathered and being pressed to passage by the Republican majority?

The great and good Mr. BRYAN knows that, underlying all other reasons for his three defeats in the race for the presidency, was antagonism to the protective tariff. It was not only free silver, free Filpinos and government ownership that hit him, but his leaning toward free trade and the conviction in the minds of the American business man and workingman that, once he got into the White House, he would command the enforcement of his economic policies, with all their dangers. And the fact of the matter is that the handful of Democrats in the house now at variance with their party on certain features of the PAYNE bill do not by any means include all the Democratic protectionists. There are others, but they lack courage to say so and act accordingly. Hence if the process of casting out is followed a bit further, by the frenzied tariff for revenue clique, Democracy will find itself split so wide open that the battle of 1912 will be a dreary formality.

Examination Work.

At the examination held at the Cherry Meadows School those making 100 per cent in the various branches follow: Ralph Carr, history and physiology; Esther Teats, history, physiology geograghy and grammar; Cora Knox, same as above; Rosa Glotfelty, physiology and geograghy; Adam Teats, arithmetic and physiology; Orvis Carr, same as above; Caroline Carr, arithmetic; Mary Carr, history; Jonas Knox, geograghy; Harry Carr, physiology; Vernie Orendorf, geography. A $200.000 TIMBER TRACT DEAL

In Which Native Garrett Countains Figure.

Deeds from John T. McGraw, A. D. Williams, John Alexander, L. M. McClintic and the Sherwood Lumber company, to the Chaffey-Wilson Lumber company, were admitted to record in Marlinton, W. Va., last Saturday, conveying 16,633 acres for a consideration of about $200,000. The transaction was the culmination of a deal that was started by A. D. Williams in the early part of 1907. Mr. Williams kept in touch with all parties and kept the deal pending in an incidental way till the country's financial conditions were such that the people comprising the Chaffey-Wilson Lumber company were ready to conclude the deal. The company is composed of Richard Chaffey, of William, West Virginia; George Wilson, Merritt Wilson, Ney Wilson, all of the Wilson Lumber company of Elkins, and Fairfax, Md.; and the Wildell Lumber company, of Wildell, W. Va.; E. H. Sincell, attorney, of Oakland, Md., and stockholder in the Wildell company; Will Hevener, merchant and banker, of Elkins. The new company is a strong one and their holdings are among the best pieces of hardwood and hemlock timber in the state. The property recently purchased lies on the east side of Greenbrier river in Pocahontas county and was rounded together by Mr. Williams in 1904, who associated with himself the other well known men in the deal.

THE DEATH RECORD.

DOROTHY DENT.

Died, at Crellin, Monday evening at 6 o'clock of diphtheria, after a short illness, Dorothy, aged 3 years, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Dent and granddaughter of Mr. Edmund Jamison, of Crellin. The funeral of the little girl took place yesterday morning, the interment being made in the Catholic cemetery. Two other children of Mr. and Mrs. Dent are suffering with the disease, one of them being extremely ill.

DEATH OF AN INFANT.

The infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry McCabe, of near Crellin, died Tuesday morning of cerebro-spinal meningitis. The child was aged three weeks and two days and was sick from its birth.

SAMPSON HARVEY.

Last Monday, at the age of seventy years, Sampson Harvey, of near Mt. Zion church, died after a lingering illness and was buried Wednesday from the U. B. church near his home. Mr. Harvey was a consistent Christian and leaves a wife and several children, all whom are grown.

MRS. GEORGE W. SHAW.

Mrs. George W. Shaw, aged seventy-five years, died Monday at her residence near Grantsville, after a long illness which took a serious turn about four weeks ago. The deceased lady resided forty years in the vicinity of Grantsville and is survived by her husband and the following children: Messrs. Columbus H. and Joseph, of Salisbury, Pa.; Dr. William P., of Berlin, Pa.; Miss Fannie, of Salisbuay; Gurnie, Lula M. and J. Tibbetts, at home. Mrs. Shaw's funeral took place in Grantsville yesterday, the body being interred in the cemetery in that town.

MRS. NELLE M. RATHBUN.

Mrs. Nelle Michaels Rathbun, wife of Mr. Frank E. Rathbun, formerly of Oakland and Mountain Lake Park, died at the home of relatives in Athens, Ohio, yesterday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. A few weeks ago Mrs. Rathbun underwent a delicate surgical operation in a Columbus hospital. While the operation was entirely successful and it was thought that she would eventually recover, the trouble with which she had been afflicted had weakened her to such an extent that she gradually failed until death came to her relief. Her funeral will occur at Athens tomorrow. She was aged 26 years and was married to Mr. Rathbun five years ago.

JAMES H. JARBOE.

This morning at 3:30 o'clock Mr. James H. Jarboe, upon the eighty-second anniversary of his birth, died at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. C. J. Rathbun, in Loch Lynn Heights. The deceased was an ex-Union soldier and served throughout the war with distinction. He was a native West Virginian but has been a resident of Maryland for a great many years. Mr. Jarboe, until last Friday, had enjoyed excellent health. On that day he was conversing with his daughter when he was suddenly stricken with paralysis which rendered him unconscious in which condition he remained until his death. His funeral will occur tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 o'clock from his late home in Loch Lynn and will be in charge of the surviving members of the Grand Army.

MAGGIE EMMA CREASY

Maggie Emma Creasy, colored, died at the home of her grandfather, Harvey Turner, in Oakland, last Tuesday and was buried the following day in the Oakland cemetery. She was aged seven years and the cause of death was tuberculosis.

SUGAR SEASON CLOSED.

Largest Maple Sugar Crop in History of Somerset County.

The warm, sunshiny days that ushered in the present week, closed the maple sugar season with a rush and all the sugar-makers were very glad of it. For once the sugar-makers got their full satisfaction of sugar-making, and never before did they reap such an enormous crop. The quality is of the finest, too, but the price is not as high as the producers would like to see it. They say the merchants do not want to pay them more than adout 6 cents per pound for their sugar, while the purchasers who buy maple sugar from the retail dealers complain of the high prices they are required to pay for it. Our local retailers are asking nine cents per pound for the best quality of maple sugar, while in Connelsville, Bedford and other towns in some of our neighboring counties that produce little or no maple sugar, it sells at prices ranging from 12½ to 15 cents per pound, according to quality.

Much sugar and syrup is being held by local producers who expect to realize higher prices later on, but whether the higher prices will materialize, remains to be seen. Some people think prices are more apt to decline than to advance, and it need surprise no one if such proves to be the case.

Some enormous yields are being reported by local sugar produders. Elijah Livengood, as usual, stands at the head of the list. His crop this year reaches a total of about 30,000 pounds, and had he opened his camp early and tapped his trees as heavily as some producers do, he probably would have made 50,000 pounds. David Keim reports a yield of 15,000 pounds, and yields ranging from 6,000 to 10,000 pounds, are quite common in this locality this year.—Somerset Star.

Resolutions of Respect.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the Universe in His great wisdom to take from us Brother Charles W. Moore and transfer his membership to that House beyond, and who departed this life on Tuesday, April 6th, 1909, and

WHEREAS, He was a member of Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias of Oakland, Md., therefore be it

Resolved, That we in no sense desire to murmur, yet our hearts are sorely touched in this Providence. Our order has lost a devoted member whose life was full of usefulness and why he was cut down in the prime of his life is a matter past our understanding. We bow in humble submission to His will and love.

Resolved, That we extend our heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved relatives of Brother Moore. We claim a partnership with them in the sweet memories of his love and friendship. "He is ours and we are God's." May this dispensation of His goodness be sanctified to our good. We suffer loss; he hath gained all yonder.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of Garrett Lodge, a copy sent to the deceased's sister and a copy be furnished each of the local papers for put lication.

All of which is respectfully submitted in F., C. and B.

In Memoriam.

After a short and very severe illness Bro. C. W. Moore was called to his reward in the great beyond, and his death has cast a shadow of gloom over the entire membership of Oak Lodge No. 8, I. O. O. F. We scarcely know how to fill the vacancy made by his departure, yet we bow in humble submission to the Allwise Father who has never made a mistake.

Bro. Charlie proved himself to be a true friend and brother, always greeting the brethren with a smile and always brought sunshine in the lodge room as well as out of it, ever seeking to advance the cause of Odd Fellowship; we shall ever miss his wise counsel and friendly advice as an Odd Fellow.

He was not only a true Odd Fellow but a consistent christian since early boyhood, had many intimate friends, but loved and respected by all who knew him. We feel very keenly our loss but our loss is his eternal gain.

To his sorrowing sister and near friends we extend our sympathy and commend them to the God that led our brother to final victory. The Psalmist David has said, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." We feel that this scripture was verified in the life and death of our deceased brother, and we trust that every member of Oak Lodge may honor the same God that Bro. Charlie honored by living a similar life and enjoy a similar triumphant death, in order that we as a lodge may meet as an unbroken brotherhood around our Father's throne in heaven.

GIVE THEM A START

The New Year is rapidly approaching. This would be a good time for you to start your young folks on the road to Success.

Early training in the practice of self-denial; instruction as to the use and value of money; opportunities for earning and saving money; all these tend to fix and fasten the children in the ways of thrift and prosperity.

We most gladly assist the young people in getting started.
